Lenormand, lẹh-nor'môn', (MARIE ANNE ADÉLAÏDE,) a French fortune-teller, born at Alençon in 1772. She wrote, besides other works, "Memoirs of the Empress Josephine," (1829,) which has been translated into Englisb. Died in 1843.

See F. GIRAULT, "Mademoiselle Le Normand, sa Biographie, ses Prédictions," etc., 1843.

Lenormant, lẹh-nor'môn', (CHARLES,) a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1802. He accompanied Champollion to Egypt in 1828, and was chosen a substitute of Guizot as professor of history in Paris in 1835. He wrote an "Introduction to Oriental History," (1838,) and other works. Died November 24, 1859.

Lenormant, (FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French archæologist, a son of the preceding, was born in Paris, January 17, 1837. He began his archæologistic studies when very young. In 1874 he was made professor of archæology in the National Library. Among his works are "Lettres assyriologiques et épigraphiques," (4 vols., 1871–72,) "Les premières Civilisations," (1874,) "Études accadiennes," (1875,) "Étude sur quelques Parties des Syllabaires cunéiformes," (1877,) "Les Origines de l'Histoire d'après la Bible," etc. Died December 9, 1883.

Lenôtre, lẹh-nōtr', (ANDRÉ,) a French architect and designer of the royal gardens, was born in Paris in 1613. He displayed his inventive genius in adorning the park and garden of Versailles for Louis XIV., and designed or embellished other royal gardens at Chantilly, Saint-Cloud, and the Tuileries. In 1675 the king granted bim letters of nobility. Died in 1700. "The gardens of the Tuileries and of Versailles," says the "Biographie Universelle," "will always be the master-pieces of tbe style invented by Lenôtre."

Lenourry, lẹh-noo're', (DENIS NICOLAS,) a learned French monk, born at Dieppe in 1647. He devoted many years to a work entitled "Apparatus ad Bibliothecam maximam Patrum Veterum," etc., (2 vols., 1694–97,) which contains critical dissertations on the works of the Fathers. Died in 1724.

Lĕn'ọx, (JAMES,) the founder of the Lenox Library in New York, was born about 1800. He was the son of a wealthy merchant of New York, of Scottish birth. James Lenox made a splendid collection of rare books. In 1870 this collection was turned over to a corporation and was made the nucleus of a free library. Mr. Lenox also built for the library a handsome building, worth, with the land it occupies, one million two hundred thousand dollars. The building was finisbed in 1877. Mr. Lenox died in 1880.

Lĕn'ọx, (MATTHEW STUART,) EARL OF, a Scottish nobleman, was the father of Lord Darnley. In 1544 he was driven out of Scotland by the hostility of the regent Arran, and went to the court of Henry VIII., who gave him his niece Margaret Douglas in marriage. He was invited to return to Scotland with his son in 1564. In 1570 he was chosen Regent of Scotland by the party which was hostile to Queen Mary. Her partisans surprised him at Stirling in 1572, and, perceiving that his friends were likely to rescue him, instantly put him to death.

Lens, lĕns or lŏN, (ANDREAS CORNELIS,) a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1739. He worked in Brussels, and painted history and portraits. He excelled in design, colouring, and chiaroscuro. Died in 1822.

See DE STASSART, "A. C. Lens," 1846.

Lens, (BERNARD,) a Belgian painter and engraver, excelled in miniature. He became court painter to George II. of England. Died in 1741.

Lenström or Lenstroem, lĕn'ström, (KARL JULIUS,) a Swedish writer, born at Gefle in 1811. He became professor of philosophy at his native place, and published, besides other works, a "History of the Theories of Art," (2 vols., 1839,) and a "History of Swedish Poetry," (1840.) Died April 6, 1893.

Lenthal or Lenthall, lĕnt'ăl, ? (WILLIAM,) an English statesman and lawyer, born in Oxfordshire in 1591. He was returned to Parliament in 1639, and in 1640 was chosen Speaker of the Commons by the popular or republican party. When the king attempted to arrest Hampden, and four other members, in the House, and asked Lenthal if they were present, he prudently replied, "I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the House, whose servant I am, is pleased to direct me." In 1653 he ceased to be Speaker, the Parliament having been violently dissolved by Cromwell, but was elected by the new House to the same office in 1654. He also acted as Speaker for a short time in 1660, before Charles II. was restored. Died in 1682, or, according to some authorities, in 1662.

Len'tu-lus, the name of a noble Roman family, a branch of the gens Cornelia, which produced several distinguished men. PUBLIUS CORNELIUS LENTULUS SURA, a man of corrupt character but popular manners, was chosen consul in 73 B.C., and was afterwards expelled from the senate for some misconduct. He was an accomplice in Catiline's conspiracy, and was persuaded by the soothsayers that he was the third member of the Cornelia gens destined by the fates to have the chief power in Rome. By the orders of Cicero and the senate, he was put to death in 62 B.C.

P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS SPINTHER was consul in 57 B.C., when he promoted the recall of Cicero. In the civil war he took arms for Pompey, was made prisoner and liberated by Cæsar, but fought for Pompey at Pharsalia, and fled to Rhodes. Nothing further is known respecting him.

Lentulus, lĕn'too-lŭs, (CYRIACUS,) a German publicist, born at Elbingen about 1620. He published, in Latin, "Arcana of Kingdoms and Republics," (1653,) and "The Absolute Prince," (1663,) which, with his other works, form an ample commentary on Tacitus. Died in 1678.

Lenz, lĕnts, (HEINRICH FRIEDRICH EMIL,) a German physician, born at Dorpat in 1804. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences at Saint Petersburg in 1834, and was afterwards professor of medicine at the university in that city, and numbered among his pupils the imperial princes. Died February 10, 1865.

Lenz, (JAKOB MICHAEL REINHOLD,) a German poet and intimate friend of Goethe, born in Livonia in 1750. He became insane in consequence of an unrequited passion for Frederica Brion, who has been celebrated by Goethe. He wrote several comedies. Died in 1792.

See A. STÖBER, "Der Dichter Lenz und Friederike von Sesenheim," 1842.

Lenz, (KARL GOTTHOLD,) a German philologist and writer, born at Gera in 1763; died at Gotha in 1809.

See HUCH, "S. Lenz's Leben," 1758.

Le'o [Fr. LÉON, lā'ôN'] I., Flā'vI-us, Emperor of Constantinople, was a native of Thrace. At the death of Marcianus, in 457 A.D., he held a high rank in the army, by which he was proclaimed emperor through the influence of Aspar, who designed to make him only a nominal monarch. Having gained a victory over the Huns, he sent an expedition against Genseric in Africa, which was unsuccessful. He is represented as an able ruler. He died in 474 A.D., having named as his successor his grandson, Leo, an infant, who died after a nominal reign of a few months. Zeno, the father of Leo II., then began to reign.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" LE BEAU, "Histoire du Bas-Empire," edited by SAINT-MARTIN.

Leo II., born about 470 A.D., succeeded Leo I. in 474, and died the same year.

Leo III., called ISAU'RICUS, one of the most able emperors of the East, was born in Isauria, of obscure parentage. In the army of Justinian II. he rose to the highest rank. When Anastasius II. was dethroned, in 716 A.D., Leo and Theodosius aspired to succeed; and the former prevailed in 717. The first important event of his reign was his great victory over the Saracens, who had besieged Constantinople for two years, (718-19.) The prosperity of his reign was soon blasted by a dispute about the use of images, which Leo prohibited in 727, and which the Greek patriarch and the pope defended. Thus began the schism of the Iconoclasts, which convulsed the empire with persecutions, revolts, and great calamities to the end of his reign, and caused the final separation of the Latin from the Greek Church. He died in 741 A.D., and was succeeded by his son, Constantine Copronymus.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" LE BEAU, "Histoire du Bas-Empire:" THEOPHANES, "History;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Leo IV., Emperor of Constantinople, born in 751 A.D., was the son of Constantine Copronymus, whom he succeeded in 775. His wife was the ambitious Irene. He was a zealous Iconoclast, and is charged with persecuting the orthodox or image-worshippers. He died in 780, leaving the throne to his minor son, Constantine VI.

See CEDRENUS, "History."

Leo V., Emperor of the East, is called THE ARMENIAN, because his father was a native of Armenia. Supported by the army, which he had corrupted, he rebelled against Michael Rangabé, and usurped the throne, in 813 A.D. He defeated the Bulgarians, who invaded his dominions, in 814. He was a zealous Iconoclast, and violently persecuted the image-worshippers, who appear to have been the majority. He was assassinated in 820 A.D., and Michael the Stammerer became emperor.

Leo VI., surnamed THE PHILOSOPHER, Emperor of the East, born in 865 A.D., was the son of Basilius the Macedonian, whom he succeeded in 886. He exiled the patriarch Photius. His empire was invaded by the Saracens, who gained several victories. After a weak and inglorious reign, he died in 911, and was succeeded by his son, Constantine Porphyrogenitus. Leo was more successful as an author than as a ruler. He wrote an esteemed treatise on Tactics, a poem on the desolation of Greece, moral discourses, and other works.

Le'o [Fr. LÉON, lā'ôN'; It. LEONE, lā-o'nā; Sp. LEON, lā-ôn'; Port. LEÃO, lā-ŏwN'] I., POPE, called THE GREAT, an ambitious and able pontiff, was a native of Rome, and was chosen bishop of that see in 440 A.D., as successor to Sixtus III. His talents and learning had been approved in several important missions. In 445 he reversed the decision of Hilaire, (Hilarius,) a French bishop, on a question of discipline. It was the constant aim of his policy to promote the supremacy of the Bishops of Rome. He pronounced against the heresy of Eutyches, which was condemned in the œcumenic Council of Chalcedon in 451. Tradition informs us that Attila, marching against Rome in 452, was persuaded by the prayers of Leo to spare that city. He failed to prevent the pillage of Rome by the Vandal king Genseric in 455. He died in 461 A.D., leaving many sermons and epistles, which are valuable for the light they throw on the history of the age. Hilarius I. was his successor.

Leo II., Pope, a native of Sicily, succeeded Agathon in 682 A.D. He is praised for virtues and learning by Catholic writers. He died in May, 684, and was succeeded by Benedict II.

Leo III., a Roman by birth, was chosen pope in 795 A.D., in place of Adrian I. His first act was the recognition of his subjection or allegiance to Charlemagne, to whom he sent the keys of Saint Peter's. In 799 he was attacked by a band of conspirators, and escaped with several wounds. Charlemagne visited Rome in 800, and was crowned by the pope as Emperor of the Romans, with the title of Augustus. Thus the Western Empire was restored, after it had been subverted three hundred and twenty-five years. Leo died in 816 A.D., and was succeeded by Stephen IV.

See J. G. Faber, "Dissertatio de Leone III. Papa Romano," 1748.

Leo IV., a native of Rome, was chosen pope in 847 A.D., in place of Sergius II. He bravely defended Rome against the Saracens, who, however, pillaged the basilica of Saint Peter. He built a suburb of his capital, which was named Leonina. His character is said to have been good. He died in 855, and was succeeded by Benedict III. The fabulous female pope Joan was supposed by some writers to have been the successor of Leo IV.

See Baronius, "Annales."

Leo V., a native of Ardea, was elected pope in 903 A.D., after the death of Benedict IV. About two months after his election he was deposed by his rival Christopher, and died in prison, according to one account, in 903.

Leo VI. succeeded John X. in 928 A.D., when the Church was in a deplorable state and Italy was filled with disorder. After a reign of seven months, he died, in 929, and was succeeded by Stephen VII.

Leo VII. was chosen pope after the death of John XI., in 937 A.D. He has the reputation of a wise and pious pontiff. His reign was not marked by important events. He died in 939, and Stephen VIII. then became pope.

Leo VIII. was elected pope in 963 A.D., in place of John XII., who had been deposed by a council. John returned, expelled Leo from Rome, and held the place until his death, in 964. The Romans then elected Benedict V.; but Leo was restored by the emperor Otho. He died in 965, and was succeded by John XIII.

See Platina, "Vitæ Pontificum Romanorum."

Leo IX., originally Bruno, broo'no, was born in Alsace in 1002, and was a cousin-german of the emperor Conrad the Salic. He was noted for learning, and became Bishop of Toul. In 1049 he succeeded Damasus II. He held frequent councils, and laboured zealously to reform the morals of the clergy Having raised an army to oppose the Normans, he was defeated by them and made prisoner, but was at last released. He died in 1054, and was succeeded by Victor II.

Leo X., (Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici—dà mĕd'ee-chee,) celebrated as a munificent patron of literature and the arts, the second son of Lorenzo de' Medici, (the Magnificent,) was born at Florence in 1475. He was created a cardinal at the age of thirteen. In 1512 he was made prisoner by the French at Ravenna, but soon regained his liberty. Julius II. having died, Cardinal de' Medici was elected pope, March 11, 1513, and assumed the name of Leo X. He announced his patronage of literature by choosing two eminent authors, Bembo and Sadolet, as his apostolical secretaries. The pontificate of Leo is a memorable epoch in religion, politics, and the fine arts. In 1515 he negotiated and signed, with Francis I. of France, an important concordat, which remained in force nearly three centuries and gave to the king the right of nominating bishops in his own dominions. One of the most momentous acts of his administration was the immense issue and sale of indulgences, which were authorized in 1517, (ostensibly for the completion of the cathedral of Saint Peter's,) and which impelled Luther to denounce the corruptions and defy the power of the Church of Rome. (See Luther.) He is censured by many Catholics for his lenity towards Luther. By violence and craft he annexed Urbino and Perugia to the Papal State. In 1521 he made a treaty with Charles V., and became the ally of that prince in a war against Francis I. The capture of Milan had just been achieved by the allies, when Leo died in December, 1521, not without suspicion of poison. He was succeeded by Adrian VI. It is generally admitted that Leo was rather worldly and luxurious as the head of the Church. His fondness for buffoonery gave much offence to the stricter Catholics. As a temporal ruler he is considered more meritorious. Under his auspices Michael Angelo obtained celebrity at Florence and the splendid works of Raphael were completed in the Vatican. He restored its alienated revenues to the Roman University, in which one hundred professors received salaries, founded a Greek college at Rome, and liberally patronized poets, scholars, and artists. The part of the sixteenth century in which learning and art flourished most remarkably is generally designated as the "age of Leo the Tenth."

Leo XI., (Cardinal Alessandro de' Medici—dà mĕd'e-chee,) was advanced in years when he succeeded Clement VIII. on the 1st of April, 1605. He died on the 27th of the same month, probably from the fatigue of the coronation. He had been legate to France under Clement VIII., and had the reputation of a virtuous and moderate prelate. Paul V. was his successor.

Leo XII., (Cardinal Annibale della Genga—del'là jĕn'gà,) was born in the district of Spoleto in 1760. Having acted for some years as nuncio in Germany and France, he became a cardinal in 1816. In September, 1823, he succeeded Pope Pius VII. He proclaimed a jubilee in 1825, and made reforms in the civil administration. His biographers give him credit for political prudence. In a circular letter of 1825 he denounced the Bible Societies. He died in February, 1829, and was succeeded by Pius VIII.

See P. Rudoni, "Leone XII. e Pio VIII.," 1829; C. Schmid, "Trauerrede auf Leo XII.," 1829; Artaud de Montor, "Histoire du Pape Léon XII.," 2 vols., 1843; Cardinal Wiseman, "Recollections of the Last Four Popes."

Leo XIII., Pope, (Gioacchino Pecci,) was born March 2, 1810, at Carpineto, in Central Italy. He was descended from an old patrician family, and studied at Viterbo and at the Collegio Romano. He graduated in law and theology, and acquired a strong enthusiasm for the philosophy of Saint Thomas Aquinas. He was named by Gregory XVI. one of his chaplains in 1837, became Bishop of Damietta in 1843, was nuncio to Belgium from 1843 to 1846, was made Archbishop and Bishop of Perugia, 1846, was created a cardinal-priest in 1853 by Pius IX., became papal camerlengo in 1877, and was chosen pope February 21, 1878. He had been a friend and favourite of Gregory XVI., who is said to have reserved him for the cardinalate. Though a strong advocate of the papal claims to temporal dominion, Leo is looked upon as a man opposed to radical measures and extreme views. By the bull "Æterni Patris" he established and defined the authority of the philosophical and theological writings of Saint Thomas Aquinas. He also authorized the publication of a great part of the records of the papal court. This publication began in 1884, and promises to afford matter of great value to the writers and students of history.

Leo, an astronomer, who lived at Constantinople. He was invited to Bagdâd by the caliph Al-Mamoon, but the emperor refused to part with him. He was appointed Archbishop of Thessalonica, but was deprived of that office, for his opposition to image-worship, in 849 A.D.

Leo [Gr. Λέων] of Byzantium, [Fr. Léon de Byzance, là'ôN' deh be'zôNss',] a philosopher, who lived about 350 B.C., was a disciple of Plato. He was sent as ambassador to Philip of Macedon. His writings have not come down to us.

Leo of Módena, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, whose proper name was Juda Arié or Arje, (aR'yà,) was born at Venice about 1572, and lived mostly in that city. He wrote verses in Hebrew and Italian, and published, besides other works, a Hebrew dictionary, and an "Account of the Rites and Customs of the Jews," (1637.) Died about 1650.

Leo OF ORVIETO, [Lat. LEO URBEVETA'NUS,] an Italian chronicler, who flourished about 1320. He wrote, in barbarous Latin, a chronicle of the emperors, ending in 1308, and a chronicle of the popes, ending in 1314.

Leo, lā'o, (HEINRICH,) an eminent German historian, born at Rudolstadt in 1799. He obtained about 1828 the chair of history at Halle, which he filled for twenty-five years or more. In 1830 he published a "Manual of Mediæval History" and a "History of the Italian States," (5 vols.,) which were received with favour. He was an adversary of the Liberal or radical party in politics. Among his other works is a "Guide to Universal History," ("Leitfaden der Universal-Geschichte," 1838–40.) He died at Halle, April 24, 1878.

Leo, lā'o, (JUAN,) surnamed AFRICA'NUS, a Moorish geographer, born at Granada, was a child when his parents, flying from the victorious Spaniards, took him to Africa in 1491. He travelled extensively in Africa and Asia, was taken captive by Christian corsairs, and presented to Pope Leo X. about 1517. He abjured Islamism, and wrote, in Arabic, a "Description of Africa," (1526,) which was published by Ramusio in 1550 and was for a long time the best work on that subject.

See CASIRI, "Bibliotheca Arabico-Hispana."

Leo, lā'o, (LEONARDO,) an eminent Italian composer, born in Naples in 1694, was a pupil of Scarlatti. He composed admired Italian operas, but acquired a more durable reputation by his "Miserere," "Dixit Dominus," and other pieces of sacred music, in which a grand effect is produced by means comparatively simple. He was the master of Piccini and of other excellent composers. His death is variously dated 1742, 1745, or 1755.

Le-on'ĭ-das, [Λεωνίδας,] a heroic king of Sparta, renowned for his invincible courage, patriotic devotion, and noble and tragical end, was the son of Anaxandrides. He succeeded his brother, Cleomenes I., in 492 B.C. When Xerxes invaded Greece with his countless myriads, in 480, the Greek Congress resolved to defend the pass of Thermopylæ, and Leonidas commanded the small band to which that task was confided. With about 4000 men, he resisted the Persian army for several days, until a treacherous Greek guided 10,000 of the enemy through a secret path over the mountain. Leonidas, perceiving that his position was turned, dismissed all his men except 300 Spartans and about 1000 other Greeks. The Spartans maintained their post until they were all slain. The Persians are said to have lost there 20,000 men. The monument raised on the grave of the Spartans bore this inscription: "Go, traveller, and tell at Lacedæmon that we fell here in obedience to her laws." He left a son, Pleistarchus, who became king.

See HERODOTUS, books v. and vii.; GROTE, "History of Greece."

Leonidas II., King of Sparta, the son of Cleonymus, ascended the throne in 256 B.C. He factiously opposed the reforms of Agis IV., his colleague, who wished to restore the regulations of Lycurgus. After having been deposed for a short time, he regained his power in 240, and procured the death of Agis. In 236 B.C. he died, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III.

Leonidas OF TARENTUM, a Greek poet, born at Tarentum, flourished about 275 B.C. He wrote about one hundred epigrams, which are preserved in the Greek Anthology and are much admired.

Le-on-nā'tus or Le-o-nā'tus, [Gr. Λεοννάτος; Fr. LÉONNAT, là'o'nà',] a Macedonian general of Pella, accompanied Alexander the Great in his invasion of Persia in 334 B.C. He was one of the officers employed about that king's person and on occasions requiring entire confidence. In the attack on Malli the life of Alexander was saved by the personal bravery of Leonnatus and Peucestas. At the death of his chief he obtained the satrapy of Phrygia Minor, and was soon urged by Antipater to aid him against the revolted Greeks. For this purpose he marched with an army into Thessaly, where he was killed in battle in 322 B.C.

Leono'wens, (ANNA HARIETTE CRAWFORD,) an author, born at Caernarvon, Wales, in 1834. She married Thomas Leonowens, who died in India, and was afterwards governess in the family of the King of Siam 1863–67. Subsequently she founded a school for the training of kindergarten teachers in New York. She published "An English Governess at the Court of Siam," "Romance of the Harem," etc.

Le-on-tĭ'a-dēs, [Gr. Λεοντιάδης,] a leader of the oligarchical party which, aided by the Spartan army, obtained the mastery at Thebes about 382 B.C. He was killed in his own house by Pelopidas in 379 B.C.

Leontief or Leontiew, là-on'te-êf', (ALEXIS LEONTIEVITCH,) a Russian savant, who obtained in 1779 the title of aulic councillor, and held other high offices. He was deeply versed in the Chinese literature, and translated into Russian several Chinese works on history, geography, etc. Died in 1786.

Leontium, le-on'she-um, [Gr. Λεόντιον,] an Athenian courtesan, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus. She acquired some distinction as a philosopher, and composed in answer to Theophrastus a work on philosophy, the style of which is praised by Cicero as written "scito quidem sermone et Attico."* Among her various lovers was Metrodorus, the disciple and intimate friend of Epicurus.

Leontius, le-on'she-us, [Gr. Λεόντιος; Fr. LÉONCE, là'ÒNss',] Emperor of the East, was born about 650 A.D. He became a general, and gained several victories. In 695 A.D. he rebelled against Justinian II., and usurped the throne. He was deposed by Apsimerus in 698, and in 705 A.D. was put to death by Justinian, who had recovered his power.

Leopardi, (GIACOMO,) COUNT, an eminent Italian poet and philologist, born at Recanati, in the Papal States, in June, 1798. Between 1818 and 1820 he won a place among the first lyric poets of Italy by canzoni "To Italy," and "On the Monument which Florence was about to erect to Dante." In 1822 he removed to Rome, where he produced an excellent criticism on the publication of the "Chronicon" of Eusebius by Mai and Zohrab, (1823.) His poems, published collectively under the title of "Canti," (1831,) contain passages of great eloquence and pathos. His prose essays, "Operette morali," (1827,) are esteemed among the finest models of Italian prose which the present century has produced. Died in Naples in 1837. "We believe," says the "Quarterly Review" for April, 1850, "it may be said without exaggeration that he was one of the most extraordinary men whom this century has produced, both in his powers and likewise in his performances, achieved as they were under singular disadvantages. For not only did he die at thirty-eight, almost nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita, but likewise 'Heaven's unimpeached decrees,' in his case, nearly 'Made that shortened span one long disease.'

With a life thus limited, . . . Count Giacomo Leopardi amassed great stores of deep and varied learning, proved himself to be possessed of profound literary judgment, exquisite taste, and a powerful imagination, and earned in his own country the character summed up in the words of one of his editors, as sommo filologo, sommo poeta e sommo filosofo." Leopardi sympathized with the efforts to liberate Italy from foreign domination.

Le'o-pōld [It. LEOPOLDO, là-o-pol'do] I., often called Leopold the Great, [Ger. LEOPOLD DER GROSSE, lā o-polt dĕr grōs'sĕh; Lat. LEOPOL'DUS MAG'NUS,] Emperor of Germany, of the house of Austria, the second son of Ferdinand III. and of Maria Anna of Spain, was born in June, 1640. He became King of Hungary in 1655, and King of Bohemia in 1657. After the death of his father, and a competition with Louis XIV. of France, Leopold was elected emperor on the 18th of July, 1658. The Turks, having invaded Hungary with a large army, were defeated at Saint Gothard in 1664, and Leopold then made with them a truce of twenty years. In 1674 he commenced war against Louis XIV., which, after indecisive campaigns on the Rhine, was ended by the treaty of Nymwegen in 1678. The Hungarians, driven by his despotic measures to revolt, chose Tekeli as their leader in 1682, and were aided by a Turkish army of 200,000 men, which besieged Vienna in July, 1683. Sobieski, King of Poland, saved the capital by a decisive victory over the Turks in September of that year. The Austrians, commanded by Prince Eugene, finished the war by a victory at Zenta in 1697, in which year also a second war against France was ended by the peace of Ryswick. The claim of his family to the throne of Spain, vacated by the death of Charles II. in 1700, involved Leopold in another war with Louis XIV. He renewed his alliance with England and Holland in 1701. His army, commanded by Prince Eugene, gained several victories in Italy in 1701–02, and shared the triumph of the allies at Blenheim in 1704. Before the termination of this long war of the Spanish succession, he died, in May, 1705, and was succeeded by his son, Joseph I. He had had three wives, the first of whom was a Spanish princess, Margarita Theresa. His prosperity is ascribed to the merit of his ministers and generals, rather than to his own abilities. Among the important events of his reign was the recognition of Ernest Augustus of Hanover, in 1692, as an Elector of the empire.

Leopold II. OF GERMANY, the second son of the empress Maria Theresa, was born May 5, 1747. At the death of his father, Francis I., in 1765, he inherited the grand duchy of Tuscany, which he ruled twenty-five years in a wise and liberal spirit. During this period he made many reforms in the administration. He suppressed the Inquisition, abolished the penalty of death, and co-operated with Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia, in the reformation of monastic discipline, which caused an angry contest between him and the court of Rome. On the death of his brother, Joseph II., February 20, 1790, Leopold became heir of the Austrian monarchy, which was then not in a prosperous condition. The Low Countries were in revolt, Hungary was discontented, Turkey and Prussia were hostile, and France was estranged from Austria by the Revolution. He quickly reduced the Low Countries to obedience by an army, and pacified his other subjects by a conciliatory policy. In 1791 he concluded peace with Turkey at Sistova, and was elected Emperor of Germany. The alarming progress of the French Revolution induced him to form an alliance with Prussia at Pilnitz, in 1791, for the restoration of Louis XVI. Hostilities were about to begin, when he died suddenly on the 1st of March, 1792, leaving the reputation of an able and just ruler. His wife was Maria Louisa, daughter of Charles III. of Spain. He was succeeded by his son, Francis II., (of Germany,) who in reference to Austria is styled Francis I.

Leopold I., King of Belgium, Duke of Saxony, and Prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, was born at Coburg in 1790. He was a son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld, was a brother of the Duchess of Kent, and uncle of the British queen Victoria. In May, 1816, he married the princess Charlotte, daughter of George IV. and heir-apparent to the throne of Great Britain, who died in childbirth before the end of that year. He refused the crown of Greece, offered to him in 1830. On the 4th of June, 1831, he was elected King of the Belgians, who were separated from Holland by the revolution of 1830. Hostilities were renewed by the Dutch, and a French army came to the aid of the Belgians. In 1832 Leopold married Louise Marie Thérèse, a daughter of King Louis Philippe. He was quite popular among his subjects, towards whom his policy was marked by liberality and a scrupulous regard for their constitutional rights. He died in December, 1865, and was succeeded by his son, Leopold II.

Leopold II., King of the Belgians, son and successor of Leopold I., was born at Brussels, April 9, 1835. He is a grandson of Louis Philippe, King of France, and a near relative of the reigning families of Great Britain and Coburg-Gotha. As Duke of Brabant, he was an active legislator before his succession (in 1865) to the throne. He is head of the Congo International Association, and takes great interest in the development of the Congo Free State. His wife, Queen Charlotte, is a niece of Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria. His children consist of two daughters, who are ineligible to the throne under the Belgian constitution.

Leopold I., Duke of Austria, was born in 1157. He served under Richard I. of England at the siege of Acre. In 1193, to gratify his avarice and to revenge an insult he fancied he had received from Richard, he arrested him at Vienna on his homeward journey and threw him into prison. He received a large sum of money for the transfer of the royal captive to the emperor Henry VI. Died in 1194.

Leopold II., Duke of Austria, born in 1292, was the third son of Albert I., Emperor of Germany, who was killed in 1308, leaving his dominions in joint-tenancy to his sons. Leopold ruled Suabia, Alsace, and Switzerland. His brothers, Frederick and Louis of Bavaria, were competitors for the imperial throne. In 1315 Leopold attacked the Swiss, (who favoured the cause of Louis of Bavaria,) and was defeated at Morgarten. In 1325 a treaty was made between the two parties, and it was agreed that Louis and Frederick should reign jointly Leopold died about 1326.

See LICHNOWSKY, "Geschichte Hauses Habsburg."

Leopold III., Duke of Austria, the son of Albert II., was born about 1350. He became ruler over Suabia, Tyrol, etc. War having broken out between him and the Swiss cantons, he was defeated and killed in 1386 at the famous battle of Sempach, where Arnold of Winkelried decided the victory by throwing himself on the Austrian spears and breaking the phalanx.

Leopold II., Grand Duke of Tuscany, was born at Florence in 1797, and was a son of Ferdinand III., whom he succeeded in 1824. He conceded a constitution to Tuscany in 1847. In consequence of the triumph of the democratic party, he retired from Florence, but was restored by the Austrian army in July, 1849. He was forced to abdicate by the revolutionary movements of the spring of 1859, and Tuscany was annexed to Sardinia. He published a fine edition of the works of Lorenzu de' Medici, (4 vols., 1825.) Died in 1870.

Lepautre, (JEAN,) a brother of the preceding, born in Paris in 1617, was a skilful designer and engraver. He designed and etched many subjects which are admirable models for architects and other artists. Died in 1682.

Lepautre, (PIERRE,) a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1660, was a son of Antoine, noticed above. He studied and worked in Rome for fifteen years, and then returned to Paris, where he obtained success, though his works are defective in taste. His chief production is the group of Æneas and Anchises, at the Tuileries. Died in 1744.

Lépaux. See LARÉVEILLÈRE.

Le Pays de, dẹh lẹh pā'e', (RENÉ,) Sieur Plessis-Villeneuve, a gay and witty French versifier, born at Nantes or Fougères in 1636. He was for many years director-general of the salt-tax (gabelle) in Dauphiné and Provence. He was noted for his bons mots. His "Friendships, Loves, and Little Loves" ("Amitiés, Amours et Amourettes," 1664) had a great success. He published many letters, sonnets, etc. Died in 1690.

Lepekhin or Lepechin, lĕp-ẹh-Keen' or lĕp-ẹh-Kin', (IVAN IVANOWITCH,) a Russian naturalist, born about 1740. He was charged by Catherine II. to explore Russia, and published the results in a "Journal of Travels through the Various Provinces of the Russian Empire," (3 vols., 1771–80.) Died in 1802.

Lepelletier, lẹh-pĕl'te-ā', (CLAUDE,) a French theologian, born in Franche-Comté about 1670, became canon of Rheims. He wrote polemical treatises against the Jansenists, and many religious works. Died in 1743.

Lepelletier or Le Pelletier, (JEAN,) a French antiquary and merchant, born at Rouen in 1633. He wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on Noah's Ark," (1704.) Died in 1711.

Lepelletier (or Le Peletier, lẹh pẹh-lẹh-te-ā') de Saint-Fargeau, lẹh-pĕl'te-ā' dẹh săN'fär'zhō', (LOUIS MICHEL,) a French revolutionist, born in Paris in 1760, was president à mortier of the Parliament of Paris, and was the owner of an immense fortune. He became a partisan of the new régime, and in 1792 was an influential member of the Convention. It appears that he had given the royalists reason to expect he would favour lenity in the king's trial, but was impelled by the terrorism of the Jacobins to vote for death. For this act he was assassinated by Pâris, a royalist, in January, 1793.

See THIERS, "History of the French Revolution;" FÉLIX LEPELLETIER, "Vie de M. Lepelletier," 1793.

Le Père, lẹh pair, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French architect, born in Paris in 1761. He accompanied the expedition to Egypt in 1798, and was directed by Bonaparte to draw up a plan for the restoration of the canal across the Isthmus of Suez. Died in 1844.

Lépicié, lā'pe'sẹ-ā', (BERNARD,) a skilful French engraver and painter, was born in Paris in 1698. He went to England, and engraved Raphael's Cartoons at Hampton Court. He afterwards worked in Paris, and became secretary of the Academy in 1740. His manner is broad and mellow, and his design correct. Died in 1755.

Lépicié, (NICOLAS BERNARD,) a French historical painter, son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1735. He was a pupil of C. Vanloo, became professor in the Royal Academy, and received the title of painter to the king. His works are marred by the faults which prevailed in the French school at that time. Died in 1784.

Lep'ĭ-dạ Do-mi'tĭ-ạ, (do-mish'e-ạ,) a Roman lady of great personal beauty but infamous character. She was the daughter of Drusus, and aunt of the emperor Nero.

Lep'ĭ-dus, the name of a celebrated Roman family of the patrician gens Æmilia. MARCUS ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS was elected consul in 187 B.C., pontifex maximus in 180, and censor in 179. He was six times chosen by the censors princeps Senatus. Died about 152 B.C. The triumvir of the same name was his lineal descendant.

Lepidus, (MARCUS ÆMILIUS,) a Roman orator, a grandson of the preceding, was consul in 137 B.C. In the next year he commanded in several battles in Spain, and was defeated. Cicero represents him as the greatest orator of his age.

Lepidus, (MARCUS ÆMILIUS,) the father of the triumvir, was prætor in Sicily in 81 B.C. In 79 he was chosen consul by the partisans of Marius, and attempted to nullify or repeal the measures of Sulla, who had just died. A violent contest ensued between the factions. In 77 Lepidus was declared by the senate a public enemy, and was defeated in battle by Pompey near Rome. He died about 76 B.C.

Lepidus, (MARCUS ÆMILIUS,) THE TRIUMVIR, was prætor when the civil war broke out between Pompey and Cæsar, in 49 B.C. He joined the party of Cæsar, who, at his departure for Spain, left Lepidus in charge of the capital. In 48 he obtained the province of Nearer Spain, with the title of proconsul, and in 46 became the colleague of Cæsar in the consulship. He was master of the horse when Cæsar was killed, in 44 B.C. When the senate and Antony came to an open rupture, Lepidus joined the latter with an army, and in October, 43, he united with Antony and Octavian to form the famous triumvirate. He put his own brother on the list of the proscribed who were sacrificed by this coalition. In the division of provinces, Spain and Narbonese Gaul were allotted to Lepidus, who remained in Italy, while the other two led their army against Brutus. After their victory at Philippi, Octavius and Antony ceased to treat him as their equal, and deprived him of his provinces in 42, but gave him a command in Africa. When the triumvirate was renewed, however, (37 B.C.,) he was nominally included in it. In 36 he failed in an attempt to recover power, and, being deserted by his troops, surrendered to Octavius, who spared his life but banished him from Rome. He died in 13 B.C.

See DION CASSIUS, "History of Rome:" APPIAN, "Bellum Civile:" MERIVALE, "The Romans under the Emperors."

Lepidus, (MARCUS ÆMILIUS,) a son of the preceding, formed a conspiracy, in 30 B.C., to kill Augustus on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium. Mæcenas detected the plot, and sent Lepidus to Augustus, who put him to death.

Lepidus, (PAULUS ÆMILIUS,) a brother of the triumvir, became ædile about 55 B.C., prætor in 53, and consul in 50. After the death of Cæsar, 44 B.C., he acted with the aristocratic party in opposition to the triumvirs. Died about 40 B.C.

He studied law, and obtained several civil offices under the Saxon and Prussian governments. He published a "Treatise on the Mediæval Architectural Monuments of Saxony and Thuringia," and a few other works. Died in 1853.

Lepsius, (KARL RICHARD,) a German philologist and antiquary, highly distinguished for his Egyptian researches, was a son of the preceding. He was born at Naumhurg, in Prussian Saxony, December 20, 1813, and received his first instruction from his father. He pursued his studies in the Universities of Leipsic and Göttingen, giving special attention to languages and philology. In 1834 he published "Palæography as an Aid to Philology," which obtained a prize from the French Institute, and was followed hy an "Essay on the Affinity of the Semitic, Indian, Ancient Persian, Egyptian, and Ethiopian Languages," (1835.) In 1836 he visited Rome, where he formed an intimate friendship with Bunsen, and wrote a "Letter to Rosellini on the Hieroglyphic Alphahet," (1837,) which attracted great attention. He visited England in 1838, and afterwards became a resident of Berlin. He produced a treatise on the "Etrurian and Oscan Dialects," (1841,) and "Ohituary of the Egyptians," ("Das Todtenhuch der Aegypter," 1842.) Lepsius having projected a great historical and antiquarian work on Egypt, the King of Prussia was induced hy Bunsen and Humholdt to send to Egypt an expedition under his direction. Assisted by artists of various sorts, he investigated the antiquities of that country from 1842 until 1846. On his return he was chosen a professor in the University of Berlin, and in 1849 produced the first volume of his "Chronology of the Egyptians." He puhlished the interesting and important results of his late expedition in a splendid work entitled "The Monuments of Egypt and Ethiopia," ("Denkmäler aus Aegypten und Aethiopien," 1849–59.) Among his principal works are "Letters on Egypt, Ethiopia, and the Peninsula of Sinai," (1852,) "Universal Linguistical Alphahet," (1855,) "The Assyrian Eponymes," (1869,) and "The Babylonian Tahles of Senkereh," (1877.) Lerma, de, dȧ lĕr'mȧ, (FRANCISCO DE ROXAS (OI ROJAS) DE SANDOVAL,) DUKE, a Spanish statesman of moderate ability. He was equerry to Don Philip, who in 1598 became king as Philip III. and appointed the subject of this article prime minister. He was then created Duke of Lerma, having previously been called Marquis of Denia. He equipped a large fleet which was ordered to cruise on the English coast, but was destroyed by a storm, after which he made a peace on terms favourable to England. For twenty years he retained the favour of the king, and had entire control of the government. His policy was mild, pacific, and prudent in some respects, but was not successful in relation to finances. He was supplanted in 1618 by his son, the Duke of Uzeda. Died in 1625.

Lerminier, lĕr'me'ne-ā', (JEAN LOUIS EUGÈNE,) a French publicist and lawyer, born in Paris in 1803. He obtained in 1831 a chair of legislation in the College of France, where his eloquent lectures were much admired by the ardent youth. Among his works are "The Philosophy of Law," (2 vols., 1831,) and a "History of the Legislators and Constitutions of Ancient Greece," (2 vols., 1852.) He wrote the article "Guizot" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale." He was remarkable for animation of style, vigour of images, and nobleness of expression. Died in 1857.

Le Roux, (HENRY,) a French author, born at Havre in 1861. He is the author of numerous novels and works of travel and belles-lettres.

Leroux, (PIERRE,) a French socialist, born in Paris in 1798. He founded, in partnership with Madame George Sand, the "Revue Indépendante." His principal work is "On Humanity: its Principle and its Prospects," ("De l'Humanité: de son Principe et de son Avenir," 2 vols., 1840.) Died April 12, 1871.

Leroy, lẹh-rwȧ', (CHARLES,) a French physician, born in Paris in 1726, was a son of Julien, noticed below. He published two valuable works, viz.: "Memoirs and Observations on Medicine," and "Mélanges of Philosophy, Chemistry," etc., (1771.) Died in 1779.

Leroy, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a natural philosopher, born in Paris, was a son of Julien, noticed below. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1751, and wrote several memoirs on electricity. Died in 1800.

Leroy, (JEAN BAPTISTE ONÉSIME,) a French dramatic writer, born at Valenciennes in 1788. He produced successful comedies. Died February 18, 1875.

Leroy or Le Roy, (JULIEN,) a French watchmaker, born at Tours in 1686. He settled in Paris, and acquired a European reputation by the excellence of his workmanship. He obviated the changes of temperature by a mechanism of compensation, invented horizontal clocks, and made many improvements in the art. In 1739 he received the title of horloger to the king. Died in 1759. His sons CHARLES, JEAN BAPTISTE, JULIEN DAVID, and PIERRE are noticed in this work.

Leroy or Leroi, (JULIEN DAVID,) a French architect, son of the preceding, was born in Paris about 1726. Having visited and studied the ancient models in Greece, he published in 1758 an excellent work entitled "Ruins of the Finest Monuments of Greece," which contributed greatly to reform the vitiated taste that prevailed in France before its appearance. The lectures which he gave for forty years as professor of architecture finished the revolution which that book commenced. He wrote, also, "Observations on the Edifices of Ancient Nations," (1767,) and other works. Died in 1803.

See GABET, "Dictionnaire des Artistes."

Leroy or Le Roy, [Lat. RE'GIUS,] (LOUIS,) an excellent French classical scholar, born at Coutances. He travelled much in his youth, and on his return home gained distinction by translations of Demosthenes' "Philippics" and of some works of Plato. He was an old man when he obtained the chair of Greek in the Collége Royal in 1572. Among his works are a "Life of Budæus," in elegant Latin, (1540,) "The Origin and Excellence of the Art of Government," (l'Art politique,) (1567,) and "The Vicissitude and Variety of Things," (1576.) He is reputed one of the first French writers who attained harmony in prose. Died in 1577.

See NICÉRON, "Mémoires;" TEISSIER, "Éloges."

Leroy, (PIERRE,) a French satirical writer, who lived about 1590, was a canon of the cathedral of Rouen. He was one of the principal authors of a very popular satire and master-piece of pleasantry, entitled "Menippean Satire on the Virtue of the Spanish Catholicon," ("Satyre Ménippée de la Vertu du Catholicon d'Espagne," 1593,) "which," said Voltaire, "was as profitable to the cause of Henry IV. as the battle of Ivry."

Leroy, (PIERRE,) a skilful watchmaker, born in Paris in 1717, was the son of Julien, noticed above. He was chiefly noted for the perfection he attained in marine time-pieces, and received a prize from the Academy for the best method of measuring time at sea. He has the credit of discovering the isochronism of spiral springs. He published several remarkable treatises on his art, —one called "Étrennes chronométriques pour l'Année 1760." Died in 1785.

Leroy-Beaulieu, lẹh-rwȧ' bō'lẹ-uh', (PIERRE PAUL,) a French economist, born at Saumur, December 9, 1843. He was educated at the Lycée Bonaparte, and at Rome, Bonn, and Berlin. In 1878 he entered the Chamber of Deputies. His essay "On the influence of the moral and intellectual condition of labourers upon their wages" (1867) received great attention. He is the author of many papers on politics, taxation, colonization, free trade, (which he defends,) finance, labour, etc. In 1878 he was chosen to the French Institute.

Leroy d'Étiolles, lẹh-rwȧ' dȧ'te'ol', (JEAN JACQUES JOSEPH,) a French surgeon, born in Paris in 1798, is distinguished as the inventor of instruments used in lithotrity. This invention was also claimed by M. Civiale; but a committee of the Academy of Sciences awarded a prize to Leroy d'Étiolles "for having first made known [in 1822] the instruments which he had invented." He died August 25, 1860.

Leroy de la Corbinaye, lẹh-rwȧ' dẹh lȧ kor'be'nȧ', (CHARLES,) a French lexicographer, born at Saint-Brieuc in 1690. He published a valuable "Treatise on French Orthography, in the Form of a Dictionary," (1739,) which is praised for accuracy, method, etc. Died in 1739.

Leroy de Saint-Arnaud, lẹh-rwȧ' dẹh sȧNt ȧr'nō', (ARNAUD JACQUES,) a French general, born in Paris about 1800. He distinguished himself in Algeria, and obtained the rank of maréchal-de-camp in 1847, and that of general of division in 1851, as a reward for his successful operations against the Kabyle tribes. Having become minister of war in October, 1851, he promoted the coup d'état of December 2, and was made a marshal of France in December, 1852. He obtained the chief command in the Crimean war, which began in 1854.

and, although suffering severely from disease, displayed his usual energy and skill at the battle of the Alma, September 20, 1854. He was obliged by the state of his health to resign the command, and he died on the 29th of September, 1854.

Léry, lā're', or Léri, (JEAN,) a French Protestant and traveller, born at Margelle in 1534. He went as a missionary to Brazil in 1556, and returned in 1558. He published, in French and in Latin, "A Narrative of a Voyage to Brazil," with a good description of that region, (1578.) Died in 1611.

Le Sage or Lesage, lẹh sȧzh, (ALAIN RENÉ,) a celebrated French romancer and dramatist, born at Sarzeau, near Vannes, (Morbihan,) May 8, 1668. He was the son of a lawyer, was educated at the College of Vannes, and is supposed to have been employed several years in the collection of taxes. In 1692 he went to Paris to study law and philosophy. There his handsome figure and his intelligence and fine literary taste procured for him free access to the most polished and aristocratic society. In 1694 he married Mademoiselle Huyard, of Paris, and was admitted as advocate of the Parliament, but soon relinquished all other pursuits that he might devote himself to literature. He studied Spanish, and improved his style by translating or imitating several Spanish comedies. His comedy "Don Cæsar Ursin," imitated from Calderon, was a failure; but his "Crispin Rival de son Maître" ("Crispin the Rival of his Master") was performed with brilliant success in 1707. In the same year he produced "Le Diable boiteux," (i.e. "The Lame Devil," popularly called in English "The Devil on Two Sticks," and sometimes "Asmodeus,") a romance, the idea and name of which he derived from a work of Luis Velez de Guevara. By its satire on all conditions, its nervous style, and its truthful portraits, this book attained great popularity. He increased his reputation by an original prose play called "Turcaret," which exposed the iniquities of the traitants and other agents of the revenue. These parties offered him one hundred thousand francs to suppress the piece; but he refused the bribe, and it was performed with immense applause in 1709. It is superior to any play which he imitated from the Spanish.

In 1715 Le Sage published two volumes of his most celebrated work, "Gil Blas de Santillane," which is perhaps a more universal favourite than any other novel, and owes its success to its admirable and natural pictures of human life in all its conditions and all its phases. It has been translated into all the languages of Europe. Voltaire and others attempted, without success, to convict him of borrowing or purloining the story from some Spanish writer. Their charges have been refuted by François de Neufchâteau. He employed the period between 1713 and 1738 chiefly in writing comic operas and other pieces, which were exhibited at the fair of Saint-Germain and were extremely popular. He published "Roland l'Amoureux," (1717–21,) an imitation of "Orlando Innamorato," and "The Adventures of Guzman d'Alfarache," (1732,) an amusing novel, superior to the Spanish work of which it is a version or imitation. In 1735 he produced a dialogue full of witty, wise, and original thoughts, entitled "A Day of the Parcæ," ("Une Journée des Parques,") and finished the last volume of "Gil Blas." After composing several other works and enjoying a large share of domestic happiness, he died at Boulogne in November, 1747. He had the reputation of a high-minded and honourable man. His eldest son, who assumed the name of MONTMÉNIL, became a famous play-actor.

Le Sage or Lesage, (BERNARD MARIE,) a French revolutionist, was a member of the Convention in 1792, and voted for the death of the king. As a Girondist he was proscribed and outlawed in 1793, but escaped by flight. Died in 1796.

Le Sage or Lesage, (GEORGE LOUIS,) a Swiss philosopher, born at Geneva in 1724. He studied medicine, but did not practise it. His favourite studies were natural philosophy, mathematics, and mechanics. In 1750 he became a teacher of mathematics at Geneva. He published an "Essay on Mechanical Chemistry," (1758,) an ingenious treatise called "Newtonian Lucretius," ("Lucrèce Newtonien," 1782,) and "Fragments on Final Causes," and left many works in manuscript. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and corresponded with D'Alembert and other eminent savants. Died in 1803.

See P. PRÉVOST, "Notice sur la Vie de G. L. Lesage," 1805; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Le Sage (or Lesage) de Montménil, lẹh sȧzh dẹh mŏN'mȧ'nēl', (RENÉ ANDRÉ,) a son of the author of "Gil Blas," was born in Paris in 1695. He made his début on the stage in 1726, and performed various rôles in comedy with success. He soon became one of the most celebrated French actors of that time. His private character is said to have been noble. Died in 1743.

Lĕs-bo'nax, [Λεσβώναξ,] a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Mitylene, who lived in the first century B.C., in the time of Augustus. He was the father of Polemon, the preceptor of Tiberius. His philosophic works have not come down to us; but we have two orations of some merit, which are ascribed to him. Another Lesbonax, a Greek grammarian, is supposed to have lived in a later period. He was author of a small work on grammatical figures, Περὶ Σχημάτων, which is extant.

See SUIDAS, "Lesbonax."

Lescaille, lā'kāl' or lā'kā'yẹ, (CATHERINE,) a Dutch poetess, born at Amsterdam in 1649, was called "the Sappho of Holland." She wrote tragedies,—"Genseric," "Cassandra," "Herod and Mariamne," etc. Died in 1711.

See MORÉRI, "Dictionnaire Historique."

Lescaille, (JACQUES,) a Flemish or Dutch poet and publisher, born in 1610, was the father of the preceding. Died in 1677.

Lescale. See SCALIGER.

Lescallier, lā'kȧ'lẹ-ā' or lā'kȧl'yȧ', (DANIEL,) a French officer of the marine, born at Lyons in 1743. He wrote a "French-English Vocabulary of Marine Terms," (1777,) and "Travels in England, Russia," etc., (1800.) Died in 1822.

Lescarbot, lā'kȧR'bo', (MARC,) a French writer and lawyer, born at Vervins. He contributed to form the first French colony in Canada, and, having returned to France, published in 1609 a "History of New France."

Lescène-Desmaisons, lā'sȧn'dā'mā'zŏN', (JACQUES,) a French historical writer, born at Granville in 1750. He published in 1781 a "History of the Last Revolution in Sweden," and in 1789 a "Political History of the French Revolution." Died in 1808.

Leschassier, lā'shā'se-ā', (JACQUES,) a French jurist, born in Paris in 1550; died in 1625.

Leschenault de La Tour, lȧsh'nō' dẹh lȧ toor, (JEAN BAPTISTE LOUIS CLAUDE THÉODORE,) a French naturalist and traveller, born at Châlons-sur-Saône in 1773. He travelled in Hindostan about five years, (1816–21.) Among his works is a "Treatise on the Vegetation of New Holland." Died in 1826.

Lĕs'chēs [Λέσχης] or Lĕs'cheūs, [Λέσχευς,] a Greek poet, born in the island of Lesbos, lived about 700 or 600 B.C. He is the reputed author of a poem called "The Little Iliad," (Ἰλιὰς μικρά.)

L'Escluse. See L'ÉCLUSE.

Lesconvel, de, dẹh lā'kŏN'vĕl', (PIERRE,) a French writer of fiction, born about 1650; died in Paris in 1722.

Lescot, lĕs'ko', (PIERRE,) an eminent French architect, born in Paris about 1510. Little is known of his life, except that he was abbé of Clagny. He designed the Louvre, which was begun about 1541. The part of this palace called the Façade de l'Horloge is considered a master-piece. Another specimen of his good taste is the Salle des Caryatides, in the same edifice. "He will ever be regarded," says the "Biographie Universelle," "as one of the greatest architects of France." Died in 1571.

See QUATREMÈRE DE QUINCY, "Vies des plus illustres Architectes:" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lescun, de, dẹh lĕs'kŭn', (THOMAS DE FOIX,) SEIGNEUR, a French general, was a younger brother of Lautrec. He was made a marshal of France in 1521. After fighting the armies of Charles V. at several places in Italy, he was mortally wounded at Pavía in 1525.

Lescure, de, dẹh lȧ'kür', (LOUIS MARIE,) MARQUIS, a French royalist and Vendean chief, was born in 1766, and was a cousin of Larochejaquelein. He was the most scientific officer in the Vendean army, and was noted for his cool bravery. He distinguished himself at Fontenay and Torfou, and was mortally wounded at Tremblaye in October, 1793. "His humanity," says Alison, "was angelic. Alone of all the chiefs in that memorable struggle, it could be said with truth that his glory was unstained by human blood." ("History of Europe.")

See MADAME DE LA ROCHEJAQUELEIN, "Mémoires."

Lescuiel, de, dẹh lā'kü'rel', (JEHANNOT,) a French poet, who probably lived in the earlier part of the fourteenth century. Nothing is known of his life. His extant ballades and rondeaux are of singular grace and elegance.

Lesdiguières, de, dẹh lȧ'de'ğe-aiR', (FRANÇOIS DE BONNE,) DUKE, a distinguished French marshal, born in Dauphiné in 1543. He fought for the Protestants in the civil war which began about 1562, and obtained the chief command of the Protestant army in 1575. He was one of those who most effectually aided Henry IV. in obtaining the throne. In 1608 he was rewarded with the rank of marshal and a dukedom, and about 1610 commanded the army in Italy, where he defeated the Spaniards. He was accused by some writers of conspiring with other Protestant leaders to form a republic after the death of Henry IV.; but he refused to fight against the court in the civil war that began about 1620. In 1622 he abjured Calvinism, and was appointed Constable of France. Died in 1626. Henry IV. once said he would acknowledge his own inferiority to no captain in Europe except Lesdiguières.

Leseur, lẹh-zuR', (JEAN BAPTISTE CICÉRON,) a French architect, born near Rambouillet, October 5, 1794. His principal books are "History and Theory of Architecture," and a valued "Chronology of the Kings of Egypt." Died in 1883.

Leseur, lẹh-zuR', (THOMAS,) an able French geometer, born at Rethel in 1703. He became a professor of mathematics in the College of Sapienza, in Rome. There he formed an intimacy with F. Jacquier, whom he assisted in two works, viz., a "Commentary on Newton's Principia" and "Elements of the Integral Calculus," (1748.) Died in 1770.

Leske, lĕs'kẹh, (NATHANIEL GOTTFRIED,) a German naturalist, born at Muskau in 1757; died in 1786.

Lesley. See LESLIE, (ALEXANDER.)

Lĕs'ley, (JOHN,) Bishop of Ross, a Scottish Catholic prelate, chiefly noted for his zeal and fidelity in the service of Mary Queen of Scots, was born in 1527. He escorted Mary from France to Scotland in 1561, and was soon after appointed Bishop of Ross. When Queen Mary was detained as a prisoner in England, and commissioners were ordered to examine her cause in 1568, Lesley was one of the commissioners whom she chose to defend her. Having taken part in the matrimonial intrigue between Mary and the Duke of Norfolk, he was imprisoned in the Tower in 1571, and released in 1573. He passed the remainder of his life in exile. He wrote a Latin work "On the Origin, Customs, and Achievements of the Scotch," (1578,) eloquent arguments in defence of Queen Mary, and other works. Died in 1596.

Lĕs'ley, (J. PETER,) an American geologist, born in Philadelphia, September 19, 1819, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1838, and at the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1844. He was engaged upon the geological survey of Pennsylvania, 1839–41, became pastor of a church near Milton, Massachusetts, in 1847, but in 1850 devoted himself to the profession of a geologist. In 1873 he was appointed professor of geology in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1874 was put in charge of the State geological survey. Among his works are "A Manual of Coal," etc., (1856,) "Man's Origin and Destiny," (1867, 1882,) "History of the First Geological Survey of Pennsylvania," (1875,) etc. He was an original member of the National Academy of Sciences, was secretary and librarian of the American Philosophical Society 1858–85, and president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science 1883–85.

Les'lie (lĕs'le) or Lesley, (ALEXANDER,) Earl of Leven, an eminent Scottish general. He served some years under Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, who promoted him to the rank of field-marshal. In 1628 he defended Stralsund with success. Having returned home in 1639, when the Covenanters were preparing to resist Charles I., he was chosen general-in-chief of their army; but before any battle was fought a treaty of peace was made. War was renewed in 1640. Leslie defeated the king's army at Newburn, and another treaty followed. He commanded the large Scottish army which, in January, 1644, marched to assist the English Parliament. Having effected a junction with the army of Fairfax, he led a division at Marston Moor, (1644,) where he was driven off the field, though his allies gained the victory. In May, 1646, Charles I. delivered himself up to the army of Leslie, then encamped at Newark. On account of his great age, he resigned his command in 1650. Died in 1661.

Leslie, (CHARLES,) a British polemical writer on politics and religion, was born in Ireland about 1650. He took orders about 1680 in the Anglican Church, and gained distinction as a disputant against the Catholics. In the Revolution, however, (1688,) he was a staunch Jacobite and nonjuror, at the sacrifice of his preferment in the church. He wrote several controversial works against the Jews, Deists, Socinians, and other sects. In his "Snake in the Grass" he attacked the Society of Friends. After the death of James II., Leslie joined the court of the Pretender in France. He died in Ireland in 1722. His most esteemed work is a "Short and Easy Method with the Deists," (1694.) Dr. Johnson pronounced him the only one of the nonjurors that could reason.

See BURNET, "History of his Own Time;" MORÉRI, "Dictionnaire Historique."

Leslie, (CHARLES ROBERT,) an eminent English historical painter, born of American parents in London in 1794, was a brother of Eliza Leslie the authoress. After passing twelve years in Philadelphia with his parents, he removed in 1813 to London, where he was instructed in the study of art by West and Allston. Among his first successful works was "Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church," (1820.) He was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1821, and Royal Academician in 1826. His subjects are mostly of a homely and familiar character, illustrative of the works of Shakspeare, Molière, Cervantes, and other humorous writers. Among his most admired productions are his illustrations of "Don Quixote." He was also successful in portraits. In 1847 he was chosen professor of painting in the Royal Academy. He published a "Life of John Constable," (1843,) and a "Hand-Book for Young Painters," (1855.) Died in 1859. "The more I learn of art," says Ruskin, "the more respect I feel for Mr. Leslie's painting as such. Given a certain quantity of oil-colour to be laid with one touch of the pencil so as to produce at once the subtlest and largest expressional result possible, and there is no man now living who seems to me to come at all near Mr. Leslie, his work being in places equal to Hogarth for decision."

Leslie or Lesley, (DAVID,) an able Scottish general. After serving with distinction under Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, he returned to Scotland about 1642. He had obtained the rank of major-general when he fought against Charles I. at Marston Moor in 1644. The success of this action was ascribed chiefly to Cromwell and Leslie. In 1646 he defeated Montrose at Philiphaugh. On the resignation of the Earl of Leven, (1650,) Leslie was chosen commander-in-chief of the Scottish army raised to restore Charles II. He intrenched his army between Edinburgh and Leith, and prudently declined Cromwell's offer of battle. Leslie followed the English army to Dunbar, where they were reduced to extremities for want of provisions. Against his own judgment, he was induced by the clergy to descend from his advantageous position and offer battle. The result was a signal defeat of the Scotch, September 3, 1650. Leslie was second or third in command at Worcester in 1651. In the retreat from this battle he was made prisoner, and was confined in the Tower until 1660. He received the title of Lord Newark in 1661. Died in 1682.

Leslie, (ELIZA,) an American writer, sister of Charles Robert, noticed above, was born in Philadelphia in 1787. She was the author of numerous tales and sketches, which display uncommon powers of humour and satire and acquired extensive popularity. Among the principal of these are "Pencil Sketches, or Outlines of Character and Manners," (1833,) "Atlantic Tales," "The American Girl's Book," and "Althea Vernon," (1841.) She also published "The Domestic Cookery Book," the "Behaviour Book," and other similar works. Died in 1858.

Leslie, (FRANK,) pen-name of Peter Carter, born at Ipswich, England, in 1821. He joined the staff of the "Illustrated London News," went to the United States in 1848, and founded "Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper" in New York in 1855. He founded several other newspapers. On his death, in 1880, his wife assumed the name of Frank Leslie and continued to publish the "Weekly" and other periodicals.

Leslie, (GEORGE DUNLOP,) an English painter, a son of C. R. Leslie, noticed above, was born in London, July 2, 1835. He became a Royal Academician in 1876. His pictures are mostly of a cheerful and domestic kind.

Leslie, (HENRY DAVID,) an English musician and composer, born in London, June 18, 1822. In 1856 he founded the Choral Society in London which bears his name. His compositions are numerous and varied in nature. Died February 4, 1896.

Leslie, (JOHN,) born in Scotland about 1570, was the father of Charles Leslie, (1650–1722.) He spoke Latin and several modern languages. He was appointed Bishop of Raphoe in 1633, and built a strong castle, which he defended against Cromwell in the civil war. He is said to have been the last in Ireland to submit to the victor. In 1661 he became Bishop of Clogher. Died in 1671.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Leslie, (Sir JOHN,) an eminent Scottish geometer and natural philosopher, born at Largo, in Fifeshire, in 1766. He was educated at Saint Andrew's and Edinburgh, and became a resident of London in 1790. In 1793 he produced a translation of Buffon's "Natural History of Birds," which was very favourably received. About 1795 he invented the Differential Thermometer. He published in 1804 his ingenious "Experimental Inquiry into the Nature and Propagation of Heat," for which the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal. In 1805 he was elected professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, although the clergy formally protested against his election, because he had commended Hume's "Theory of Causation." He succeeded Playfair as professor of natural philosophy in Edinburgh in 1819, and contributed much to the perfection of the apparatus and experiments of that department. He wrote many scientific articles for the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and "Edinburgh Review." Among his separate publications were "Elements of Geometry," etc., (1809,) and "Elements of Natural Philosophy," (1823.) He wrote an interesting and excellent "Discourse on the Progress of Mathematical and Physical Sciences during the Eighteenth Century," which is one of the preliminary dissertations in the first volume of the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His treatise on "Heat," above noticed, indicates a remarkable original genius, and constitutes an era in the history of that branch of science. Died in 1832.

Leslie, (THOMAS EDWARD CLIFFE,) an able economist, born in the county of Wexford, Ireland, probably in 1827. He was called to the English bar, and in 1853 was appointed professor of jurisprudence and political economy in the Queen's College, Belfast, but he lived chiefly in London and on the Continent. His principal works are "The Land System of France," (2d edition, 1870,) "Essays in Political and Moral Philosophy," (1879,) and a volume on "Land Systems." Died in 1882.

Lespinasse. See ESPINASSE, DE L'.

Lespinasse, lĕs'pe'năs', (AUGUSTIN,) COUNT, a French general, born at Preuilly in 1737. In 1796 he fought under Bonaparte in Italy, and directed the artillery at Mantua, Castiglione, and Arcola with great skill, and obtained the rank of general of division. Died in 1816.

Lesquereux, lā'kĕh-RUH', (CHARLES LÉO,) a Swiss-American botanist, born at Fleurier, near Neufchâtel, November 18, 1806. He was educated at the College of Neufchâtel, was a professor at Eisenach, and later the head of a college at Chaux de Fonds. When twenty-five years old, he became totally deaf. He was director of the exploitation of the peat-bogs of Neufchâtel. In 1848 he was brought to the United States by Prof. Agassiz. Besides two volumes on peat-bogs, (in French, 1844, 1845,) he published "Musci Americani," (with W. S. Sullivant, 1856, 1865,) "Manual of the Mosses of North America," (with T. L. James, 1884,) and a large number of monographs and reports on the fossil botany of North America, chiefly published in connection with the various State and United States surveys. D. 1889.

Lessart, de, dĕh lā'sär', (ANTOINE DE VALDEC,) a French minister of state, born in Guienne in 1742. He was appointed minister of the interior about January 1, 1791, and minister of foreign affairs in December of that year. His policy offended the dominant party, which impeached him in March, 1792. He was imprisoned, and perished in the massacre of September, 1792.

See THIERS, "History of the French Revolution."

Lesseps, de, dĕh lā'sĕp', (FERDINAND,) a French diplomatist, born at Versailles in 1805. He became consul at Cairo about 1833, and in 1842 was appointed consul at Barcelona. During the bombardment of this city by Espartero, Lesseps performed perilous acts of humanity, for which he received testimonials of honour from several governments. He was minister at Madrid from April, 1848, to February, 1849. In May, 1849, he was sent to Rome to negotiate a peace between the popular party and the French army. He was recalled in disgrace in June of that year, because he was too favourable to the Roman republic. He projected the ship-canal across the Isthmus of Suez, which, under his superintendence, was completed, at a cost of nearly sixty millions of dollars, and opened in November, 1869. Subsequently (1873–1880) he perfected a plan for the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, but, after the expenditure of over $120,000,000, the company was forced into liquidation. In 1892–93 the management was charged with breach of trust, and five directors were condemned, he being sentenced to a fine and five years' imprisonment. He was too ill to be taken from his house, and died December 7, 1894.

Lesseps, de, (JEAN BAPTISTE BARTHÉLEMI,) a French traveller and civil officer, born at Cette in 1766. As interpreter he accompanied La Pérouse's expedition in 1785, and on their arrival at Kamtchatka (1787) was sent home by land with despatches, etc. He published a Journal of his Travels from Kamtchatka to France, (1790.) Died in 1834.

Lesser, lĕs'sẹr, (FRIEDRICH CHRISTIAN,) a German naturalist and theologian, born at Nordhausen in 1692. He became pastor of a church in Nordhausen in 1739.

His most popular work is the "Theology of Insects," (1738.) "The plan of this work is excellent," says Walckenaer; "but the art of describing with precision and narrating with elegance is not found in it." He also wrote the "Theology of Stones," (1735.) Died in 1754.

Lessing, lĕs'sing, (GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM,) an eminent author, regarded as the father of the new era of German literature, was born at Kamentz, in Upper Lusatia, in 1729. When twelve years old, he was sent to the high school at Meissen, where he distinguished himself by his application and his rapid acquisition of knowledge. Being destined by his parents to the ministry, he entered, at the age of seventeen, the university at Leipsic. While here, his taste for general literature and his fondness for the theatre caused him to neglect, and ultimately to abandon, the study of theology, that he might devote himself wholly to his favourite pursuits. Not to mention several dramas of minor importance, Lessing brought out in 1755 "Miss Sarah Sampson," a tragedy, which was received by the German public with extraordinary favour, and was translated into other languages. In 1757 he commenced, in concert with Mendelssohn and Nicolai, the publication of the "Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften," (literally, the "Library of the Beautiful Sciences,")—a literary journal of great merit. He published in 1766 his "Laocoon, or the Limits of Poetry and Painting." This work has exerted a great and permanent influence on the science of criticism in Germany, both in literature and art. In 1768 appeared the "Dramaturgie,"—another critical work, in which Lessing opposes the French and defends the English drama. He completed in 1772 his "Emilia Galotti," which has been styled "the master-piece of German tragedy, as the 'Laocoon' is the master-piece of German criticism;" and in 1775 he brought out his "Minna von Barnhelm," regarded as the most perfect of his comedies. His last important work was "Nathan the Wise," ("Nathan der Weise,")—a sort of controversial drama in iambic verse, directed against religious intolerance. Our limits will scarcely permit us to do more than allude to his various minor productions, nearly all of which, in a greater or less degree, bear the decided impress of an earnest, independent, and original mind. We may, however, mention his "Letters on Literature," ("Literaturbriefe,") his "Education of the Human Race," ("Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts,") and especially his "Fables," so rich in wit and original thought: many of these have a literary application.

One of the great objects for which Lessing earnestly laboured was to build up a national literature. The Germans had previously, to a great extent, neglected or despised the rich native resources of their own tongue. Lessing sought by precept and example to recall his countrymen from the almost exclusive study of the French, recommending in preference the English dramatic models, as superior in themselves and better adapted to the genius of the German people.

In 1760 Lessing was made a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, and soon after accompanied General Tauenzien, Governor of Silesia, as his secretary, to Breslau, where he resided five years. During this period he became addicted to gambling; but this vice does not appear to have materially interfered with his application to literature. In 1770 he obtained the office of head librarian of the Wolfenbüttel Library. Soon after, he discovered and published the famous "Wolfenbüttel Fragments," (on the discrepancies of the gospel narratives,) by Reimarus, who, however, at that time was not known as the author. This publication brought upon Lessing much censure and reproach: he was accused of a deliberate design to undermine Christianity. If, however, we may believe his friend Herder, he gave those "Fragments" to the public "purely for the interests of truth, for the sake of freer inquiry and of examination and confirmation on all sides." A candid examination of Lessing's own writings will, we are persuaded, go far to justify, if not fully to confirm, Herder's opinion. The extraordinary activity and incessant application of Lessing's mind at length wore out his physical constitution. He died at Brunswick 1781, aged fifty-two.

Lessing, (KARL FRIEDRICH,) an eminent German painter, and grand-nephew of the celebrated critic, was born at Wartenberg in 1808. He studied architecture for a time, but soon yielded to his stronger attraction for painting. In 1825 he finished his picture of "The Church-Yard," which excited great admiration. He soon after studied historical painting under Schadow at Dusseldorf. In this department he produced in 1829 "The Battle of Iconium," and completed other illustrations of the life of Frederick Barbarossa, left unfinished by Cornelius. His next productions, representing scenes from Bürger's "Lenore" and Uhland's "Royal Mourners," display great originality and poetic fancy. Among his master-pieces we may also name "Huss before the Council of Constance," "The Robber and his Child," and a "Scene in the Eifel," with several other exquisite landscapes. Lessing, while retaining many of the peculiar excellencies of the ideal or romantic school, avoided the formality of style into which it has sometimes degenerated. Died June 5, 1880.

See NAGLER, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Lessing, (KARL GOTTHELF,) a German dramatist, born in 1740, was a brother of the great author. He published several comedies, and a "Life of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing."

Lessius, les'se-us, (LEONARD,) a Flemish Jesuit, born at Brechtan, in Brabant, in 1554. He lectured on theology with éclat at Louvain from 1585 until 1623. He wrote several popular works, among which are one "On Justice and other Cardinal Virtues," (1621,) and another "On the Power of the Pope." He was charged with favouring semi-Pelagianism. Died in 1623.

Lessmann, lĕs'mân, (DANIEL,) a German littérateur, born at Soldin in 1794. He wrote lyric poems, and a number of novels and tales. He died in 1831, it is supposed by suicide.

Lesson, lȧ'sôn', (RENÉ PRIMEVÈRE,) a French naturalist, born at Rochefort in 1794. Among his numerous works are a "Manual of Ornithology," (2 vols., 1828,) and a "Supplement to the Works of Buffon," ("Complément des Œuvres de Buffon," 10 vols., 1828 et seq.) Died in 1849.

See AMÉDÉE LEFÈVRE, "Éloge historique de R. P. Lesson," 1850.

Lĕs'tėr, (CHARLES EDWARDS,) an American littérateur, born in New London county, Connecticut, in 1815. He published the "Life and Voyages of Americus Vespucius," "Artists of America," and various other works, and made several translations from the Italian. Died January 29, 1890.

Lestiboudois, lĕs'te'boo'dwȧ', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French botanist, born at Douay in 1715; died in 1804. His grandson, THÉMISTOCLES, born at Lille in 1797, was a physician and writer on botany, etc. Died in 1876.

Lestocq or Lestoq, lĕs'tok', (JOHANN HERMAN,) a surgeon, born of French parents in Hanover about 1695. He removed in 1713 to Saint Petersburg, and became surgeon to Peter the Great. In 1725 he was appointed surgeon to the princess Elizabeth. He was the master-spirit of the plot or revolution which made her empress in 1741. For some years afterwards he was treated with much favour, and took an influential part in affairs of state; but in 1750 he was disgraced and exiled. He was recalled by Peter III. in 1762. Died in 1767.

Lestoile or Létoile. See ÉTOILE, DE L'.

L'Estrange, lĕs-trānj′, (Sir ROGER,) an English partisan writer, born in Norfolk in 1616, was a zealous royalist in the civil war. Having been detected in a plot to surprise Lynn, he was sentenced to death as a spy in 1644, but obtained a respite, and escaped in 1648. After passing a few years in exile, he returned in 1653 and obtained from Cromwell a release from the sentence. In the reign of Charles II. he was censor of the press. He translated the works of Josephus, Seneca's "Morals," and Æsop's Fables, and wrote many popular political tracts. His style is censured for vulgarity, and his works abound in slang. After the restoration he edited several political journals. "His Æsop's Fables," says Hallam, "will present everything that is hostile to good taste." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1704.

See "Biographia Britannica."

Lesueur or Le Sueur, lẹh-sü′ŭr′, (CHARLES ALEXANDRE,) a French naturalist and designer, born at Havre in 1778. He explored with Péron the coasts of Australia, and wrote many memoirs on mollusca, etc. Died in 1846.

Lesueur, (CICÉRON JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French architect, born near Rambouillet in 1794, became a member of the Institute. He published a "Chronology of the Kings of Egypt," (1848–50.) Died December 26, 1883.

Lesueur, (EUSTACHE,) an excellent painter of history, surnamed "the French Raphael," was born in Paris in 1617. He was a pupil of Vouet. He excelled in composition, expression, and chiaroscuro. Among his works are "Saint Paul Preaching at Ephesus," "The Annunciation," "The Life of Saint Bruno," (in 22 pictures,) and "The Death of Tabitha." The first is called a master-piece of invention and style. He died prematurely in 1655.

Leuwenhoek, van, vän luh'wĕn-hook', (ANTOON,) sometimes written Leeuwenhoek or Leeuwenhoeck, a celebrated Dutch naturalist, born at Delft in 1632. He first acquired reputation by his skill in the fabrication of microscopes. By his successful use of the microscope in researches into the intimate structure of the human system and the composition of animal fluids, he afterwards obtained celebrity as an anatomist and physiologist. He communicated many of his discoveries to the Royal Society of London, of which he was chosen a Fellow in 1680. He discovered the so-called animalcules in the spermatic fluid in 1677. About 1690 he proved the continuity of the arteries with the veins, and successfully combated the prevalent hypothesis of the fermentation of the blood. He described with accuracy the structure of the lamina which compose the crystalline lens of the eye. In 1698, Peter the Great, passing through Delft, requested the favour of seeing Leuwenhoek and his microscopes, which was accorded. Died in 1723. Leuwenhoek's works were printed in the "Philosophical Transactions," (London.) Four volumes of his collected works were published at Leyden in 1724, under the title of "Opera Omnia."

Leverrier or Le Verrier, lẹh vȧ′rẹ-ȧ′, (URBAIN JEAN JOSEPH,) an eminent French astronomer, born at Saint-Lô (La Manche) in March, 1811. He entered the Polytechnic School about 1830, and after leaving it devoted himself with success to chemistry and mathematics. He became a tutor (répétiteur) in the Polytechnic School, and in 1839 wrote two treatises on astronomy, which procured for him the friendship of Arago. In January, 1846, he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences. Before that date he had undertaken to rectify the tables of Uranus, the orbit of which was subject to perturbations from an unknown cause. Conjecturing this cause to be a planet, he calculated its orbit, mass, and position, and announced the results in a memoir to the Academy of Sciences in June, 1846. The planet was observed by telescope near the place indicated, by Galle, of Berlin, in September of that year, and received the name of Neptune. Leverrier acquired a just celebrity by this great discovery, and was appointed professor of astronomy in the Faculty of Sciences, Paris. In 1849 he was elected to the Legislative Assembly. Having supported Louis Napoleon's policy, he was chosen a senator in 1852. He succeeded Arago in 1853 as astronomer to the bureau of longitudes and director of the Imperial Observatory. He published, besides other works, "Annales de l'Observatoire de Paris," (1856.) About 1860 he presented to the Institute an interesting memoir on Mercury. He observed a movement of the perihelion of that planet which suggested the existence of a small planet between Mercury and the sun. In 1870 he was removed from the position of director of the Observatory. Died Sept. 23, 1877.

Lewes, lu′iss, (GEORGE HENRY,) a popular English author, distinguished for his learning and versatility, was born in London in 1817. He studied medicine, but soon exchanged that profession for literature, in which his labours have been very abundant and diversified. He contributed many literary, historical, scientific, and philosophical essays to the "Edinburgh," "Westminster," and other quarterly reviews. He also wrote articles for Blackwood's and Fraser's Magazines and the "Penny Cyclopædia." Among his principal separate works we may mention "Biographical History of Philosophy," (1845,) "Rose, Blanche, and Violet," a novel, (1848,) "Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences," (1853,) "The Life and Works of Goethe," (1855,) which is one of his most popular productions, and "Sea-Side Studies," (1858.) He is the author of a successful tragedy, "The Noble Heart," (1850,) and of other dramas. In 1865 he became for a short time the chief editor of the "Fortnightly Review." Died November 30, 1878.

See "British Quarterly Review" for July and October, 1864.

Lewis or Ludwig, lood′wĭg, (KARL AUGUST,) I., King of Bavaria, born in August, 1786, was the son of King Maximilian Joseph. He married in 1810 the princess Therese of Saxe-Hildburghausen. Before his accession he built the Glyptothek, a splendid museum for the masterpieces of sculpture. He became king in 1825, and made economical reforms in the government. His reign is remarkable for the great impulse given by his liberality and taste to the fine arts, especially architecture. He assembled in his capital many scholars and artists, and adorned Munich with numerous fine edifices, among which are the Odeon, the Pinakothek, the royal palace, university, and several churches. He built the famous Walhalla at Ratisbon, (Regensburg,) and made a canal which bears his name. In 1829 he published a collection of poems. The latter part of his reign did not correspond with the beginning. He excited disaffection by restoring convents and restricting the political and religious liberties of his subjects. The influence of Lola Montez over the king was another cause of offence. Stimulated by the revolution in France, (1848,) the Bavarians revolted, demanding reforms, in consequence of which he abdicated in March, 1848, in favour of his son, Maximilian II. Otho, ex-King of Greece, was his second son. Died at Nice in February, 1868.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lewis II., (OTHO FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) King of Bavaria, was born at Nymphenburg, August 25, 1845. In 1864 he succeeded his father, Maximilian II. His mother was of the royal house of Prussia. The king in 1866 took part with Austria in the war against Prussia, but after the defeat of his armies he took the Prussian side. He was ostensibly the first to propose the new German empire with William of Prussia at its head. In that empire Bavaria was merged, but retained a nearly autonomous position. The king, becoming insane, committed suicide June 14, 1886.

Lew'is or Louis, loo′is, [Ger. LUDWIG, lood′wĭg;

Lat. LUDOVI'CUS,] I., King of Germany, styled LE GERMANIQUE, (or GERMAN'ICUS,) the third son of Louis le Débonnaire, was born in 806, and became King of Bavaria in 817 A.D., when his father divided his dominions among his three sons. Having revolted against his father, he seized Saxony, and assumed the title of King of Germany. In alliance with Charles the Bald, he defeated his brother, Lothaire I., at Fontenoy in 841. He died in 876 A.D., leaving three sons, Carloman, Lewis, and Charles.

See H. LUDEN, "Geschichte des Deutschen Volkes," 12 vols., 1825-37; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lewis (Ludwig) II. or III. of Germany was the second son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in 876. The same year he defeated his uncle, Charles the Bald, who had invaded his kingdom. He died at Frankfort in 882, while waging war with the Normans.

Lewis (Ludwig) III. or IV., called THE INFANT, (DAS KIND,) born in 893 A.D., was the son of the emperor Arnulph, and became King of Germany in 900. He died in 912, and was the last prince of the race of Charlemagne in Germany.

Lewis IV. or V., Emperor of Germany, born in 1286, was the son of Lewis, Duke of Bavaria, and Matilda, who was a daughter of the emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg. After the death of Henry VII. (1314) Lewis and his cousin, Frederick of Austria, were rival candidates for the throne, and both claimed to have been elected. A long civil war was the result, in which the Ghibelines fought for Lewis and the Guelphs for Frederick, who was taken prisoner in 1322. Lewis released him after he had signed an act of renunciation of the empire, and was crowned at Rome in 1328. About this time he was excommunicated by Pope John XXII., against whom he retorted the charge of heresy. In 1346 Clement VI. issued a bull against Lewis, and attempted to transfer the crown to Charles IV.; but Lewis defended himself until his death, in 1347.

See CONRAD MANNERT, "Kaiser Ludwig IV.," 1812; N. BURGUNDUS, "Historia Bavarica, sive Ludovicus IV.," etc., 1636; J. SCHLETT, "Biographie von Kaiser Ludwig dem Bayer," 1822; KOTZEBUE, "Geschichte Kaiser Ludwigs IV.," 1812.

Lewis I., surnamed THE GREAT, King of Hungary and Poland, born in 1326, was the son of Charobert, whom he succeeded on the throne of Hungary in 1342. He waged successful wars against the Venetians and against Joan, Queen of Naples. After the death of his uncle Casimir, in 1370, he was elected King of Poland. He died in 1382, leaving three daughters, one of whom was married to Sigismund, Emperor of Germany. He is said to have been a just and wise ruler.

Lewis II. of Hungary and Bohemia was born in 1506, and succeeded his father, Ladislaus VI., in 1516. Owing to his youth and the factious conduct of the nobles, his power was only nominal. In 1521 he married Mary, a sister of the emperor Charles V. His kingdom was invaded by the Turks, and his army completely defeated at Mohács, where Lewis was killed in 1526. He left no issue, and Ferdinand I. of Austria became master of Hungary.

Lewis, (Kings of Italy and Spain.) See LOUIS.

Lewis [Sp. LUIS, loo-ĕss'] I. of Spain, the eldest son of Philip V., was born in 1707. Philip V., having fallen into a melancholy mood, retired to the solitude of Saint Ildefonso, and resigned the crown to Lewis, who was proclaimed in January, 1724. A few months after his accession he died of smallpox, and Philip V. resumed the cares of royalty.

Lewis [Ger. LUDWIG, lood'ŵig] I., Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, born in 1753, succeeded his father in 1790. He joined the alliance against Napoleon in 1813. Died in 1830.

See STEINER, "Ludwig I. von Hessen-Darmstadt," 1842.

Lewis (Ludwig) II., a son of the preceding, was born in 1777, and became grand duke in 1830. Died in 1848.

Lewis, (Ludwig,) Prince of Prussia, often called Ludwig Ferdinand, was a nephew of Frederick the Great, and was born in 1772. He was a son of Prince August Ferdinand. He served in the campaign against the French in 1792. In 1806 he was the head of the war-party which urged the king into a disastrous contest with Bonaparte. Having obtained the rank of lieutenant-general, he engaged a superior force under Lannes at Saalfeld, October 10, 1806, when he was defeated and killed, preferring to die rather than to surrender.

Lew'is, (ANDREW,) born in Ireland about 1730, emigrated to Virginia, and served with distinction in the war of the Revolution, being made brigadier-general about 1775. His statue occupies a place near Washington's Monument at Richmond. Died in 1780. His three brothers, THOMAS, WILLIAM, and CHARLES, were also noted as patriots and soldiers.

Lewis, (ANGELO,) an English author, born at London in 1839. Under the pen-name of Professor Hoffmann he wrote "Modern Magic" and other books on card games and conjuring tricks.

Lewis, (CHARLES B.,) an American humourist, born in Ohio in 1842. Under the pen-name of M. Quad he produced several humourous works, and was a prolific newspaper writer.

Lewis, (DIO,) an American physician, born at Auburn, New York, March 3, 1823. He was educated in the medical schools of Boston and Buffalo, published many books on health and kindred subjects, and wrote largely on educational topics, especially on gymnastics as an element of education. Died May 21, 1886.

Lewis, (EDMONIA,) an American sculptor, of negro and Indian extraction, born near Albany, New York, about 1845. Among her works are "The Freedwoman on first hearing of her Liberty," and a bust of Colonel Shaw.

Lewis, (ELLIS,) LL.D., an able American jurist, born in York county, Pennsylvania, in 1798. He rose through various offices to be chief justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1854. Died in 1871.

Lewis, (ENOCH,) a distinguished American mathematician, born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1776. He became teacher of mathematics in the Friends' Academy, Philadelphia, in 1799, and subsequently at the Westtown Boarding-School, established by the Society of Friends. He was the author of treatises on algebra, trigonometry, etc., a "Life of William Penn," and other valuable works. In 1847 he became editor of the "Friends' Review," Philadelphia. Died in 1856.

Lewis, (ESTELLE ANNA ROBINSON,) an American poetess, born in Maryland about 1825, published "Records of the Heart," (1844,) "Myths of the Minstrels," (1852,) "The King's Stratagem," (1873,) "Sappho, a Tragedy," (1875,) and made numerous contributions to American and European journals. Died Nov. 24, 1880.

Lewis, (FRANCIS,) one of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence, born in Wales in 1713, emigrated to New York in 1735. He was elected to the Continental Congress in 1775. Died in 1803.

Lew'is, (Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL,) Bart., an eminent English statesman and author, born in London in October, 1806, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis. He graduated with high honours in the classics at Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1831, but never practised law. In 1844 he married a sister of the Earl of Clarendon. In 1847 he was elected by the Liberal party member of Parliament for Herefordshire, and was appointed secretary to the board of control. He became under-secretary for the home department in 1848, and secretary of the treasury in 1850. He resigned this office when Lord John Russell ceased to be premier, in March, 1852. In this year he published a "Treatise on the Method of Observing and Reasoning in Politics." He became editor of the "Edinburgh Review" in 1854, but retired from that post in the early part of the next year. From February, 1855, until February, 1858, he was chancellor of the exchequer in Palmerston's cabinet. On the formation of a new Liberal ministry under Palmerston, in June, 1859, Sir George was appointed home secretary. He succeeded Lord Herbert as secretary of war in July, 1861. He wrote several able political and philosophical works, among which is an "Inquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History," and, with the Right Hon. H. Tufnel, made a translation of K. O. Muller's "Die Dorier," ("The Dorians," 2 vols., 1830.) Died in 1863.

Lewis, (JOHN,) an English theologian and antiquary, born at Bristol in 1675. He became curate of Margate and rector of Saltwood and Eastbridge. Besides many works on theology, he published a "History of John Wickliff," (1720,) and a "Life of Caxton," (1737.) Died in 1746.

Lewis, (JOHN FREDERICK,) an excellent English painter, born in London in 1805, received instruction from his father, F. C. Lewis, a landscape-painter. After a visit to Spain, he produced about 1835 several admired pictures in water-colours of Spanish scenes, among which was a "Bull-Fight in Seville." Between 1840 and 1850 he worked and travelled in Egypt, Asia Minor, and other parts of the Levant. After his return he increased his reputation by excellent and finely-finished pictures of "The Harem," (1850,) "An Arab Scribe," and "Mount Sinai." He was elected president of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours in 1855, and became an associate of the Royal Academy in 1859. Died in 1876.

Lewis, (Lady MARIA THERESA,) an English author, born in 1803, was a sister of the Earl of Clarendon. She was married to Thomas Henry Lister in 1830, and to Sir George Cornewall Lewis in 1844. She edited Miss Eden's stories "The Semi-Detached House" and "The Semi-Attached Couple," and was credited with their authorship. Died in 1865.

Lewis, (MATTHEW GREGORY,) a successful English novelist and dramatist, often called Monk Lewis, was born in London in 1775. He inherited from his father an ample fortune, which consisted partly in an estate and slaves in Jamaica. About the age of twenty he produced "The Monk," a novel which, by an artful combination of mysterious horrors and voluptuous images, obtained a large circulation, but was stigmatized as pernicious by the stricter moralists. He composed several successful dramas, among which were "The Castle Spectre," "Adelgitha," a tragedy, and "Timour the Tartar," (1812.) He also wrote other romances and a few poetical pieces. He died at sea, on a voyage from Jamaica to England, in 1818.

See "Life and Correspondence of M. G. Lewis," London, 1839; "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1803, (by SYDNEY SMITH.)

Lewis, (MERIWETHER,) an enterprising American traveller, born in Virginia in 1774. He became private secretary to President Jefferson about 1801, and was soon after employed by the United States government, conjointly with Captain Clarke, to explore the northwest part of the American continent. They gave the names of Jefferson, Gallatin, and Madison to the three streams which form the Missouri. They also explored the Columbia River to its mouth. After his return, in 1806, Captain Lewis was made Governor of Missouri Territory. He committed suicide in 1809, in a fit of temporary insanity. One of the principal affluents of the Columbia River was named in his honour. A "Memoir" of Captain Lewis was written by Jefferson.

See "Quarterly Review" for January, 1815; "Edinburgh Review" for February, 1815; "Monthly Review" for July, August, and September, 1815.

Lewis, (MORGAN,) an American general and Governor, born in the city of New York in 1754, was a son of Francis, noticed above. He served with distinction in the Revolutionary war, at the end of which he had the rank of colonel. In 1801 he became chief justice of the supreme court of New York. He was Governor of that State from 1805 to 1807, and commanded the forces in New York in 1814, with the rank of major-general. Died in 1844.

See "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. iii.

Lewis, (TAYLER,) LL.D., a distinguished American scholar and author, born in Saratoga county, New York, in 1802, became professor of Greek in Union College in 1849. He wrote critical and theological works evincing much learning and ability. Died May 11, 1877.

See ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors."

Lewis, (WILLIAM,) an English chemist and physician, who practised at Kingston, Surrey. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and was employed to read lectures on chemistry to the Prince of Wales at Kew. He published "An Experimental History of the Materia Medica," (1760,) and other works. Died in 1781.

Lewis, (WILLIAM DRAPER,) an American educator, born at Philadelphia in 1867. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1891, became instructor in the Wharton School of that institution and lecturer on economics at Haverford College, and was appointed dean of the law school of the University of Pennsylvania in 1896. He edited a number of legal works, and wrote considerably on legal and other subjects.

Ley or Leigh, lee, (Sir JAMES,) an English lawyer, born in Wiltshire in 1552. He was appointed chief justice of the court of king's bench in 1621, and lord high treasurer in 1625. He was afterwards created Earl of Marlborough. Died in 1628. His "Reports of Cases in the Courts of Westminster" were published.

Leyba, de, dā lā'e-bȧ, (FRANCISCO,) a Spanish dramatic poet of the seventeenth century. His works are highly commended.

Leybourn, lā'burn, ? (WILLIAM,) an English mathematician, who was in his youth a printer in London. He edited the works of Gunter, and published, besides other works, "The Complete Surveyor," "Mathematical Course," ("Cursus Mathematicus," 1690,) and "The Trader's Guide," (1693.) He died about 1690.

Leydecker, lī'dĕk'ẹr, (MELCHIOR,) a learned Dutch Calvinist theologian, born at Middelburg in 1642. He became professor of theology at Utrecht in 1678, and published (in Latin) several esteemed works, among which are a "History of the African Church," (1690,) "On the Hebrew Republic," (1704,) and a treatise against the philosophy of Descartes, called "The Torch of Truth," ("Fax Veritatis.") Died in 1721.

Leyden, lī'dẹn, (JOHN,) M.D., a Scottish poet and antiquary, eminent as an Oriental scholar, was born at Denholm, on the Teviot, in 1775. At a college of Edinburgh he studied the principal ancient and modern languages. He afterwards studied medicine, and in 1802 went to Madras as an assistant surgeon in the service of the East India Company. There he learned Sanscrit, Persian, Hindostanee, and other Asiatic languages. About 1806 he was appointed professor of Hindostanee at Calcutta. He became assay-master of the Calcutta Mint in 1810. He contributed to Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," wrote other poetical pieces, and published a treatise "On the Languages and Literature of the Indo-Chinese Nations." Died in Java in 1811.

Leyden, (JOHN OF.) See JOHN OF LEYDEN.

Leyden, van, vȧn lī'dẹn, (LUCAS,) [Fr. LUCAS DE LEYDE, lü'kȧs' dẹh lȧd,] or LUCAS Dammesz, a celebrated Dutch painter and engraver, born at Leyden in 1494. He received his first lessons in design from his father, Hugh Jacobs or Jacobze, and at the age of twelve painted in distemper a picture of Saint Hubert, which was greatly admired. He painted, with equal success, landscapes and portraits. As an engraver he excelled in aerial perspective and chiaroscuro, and, according to Vasari, surpassed Albert Dürer in composition. "As a painter," says the "Biographie Universelle," "he passes for the greatest artist of the Flemish school in his time." Among his master-pieces are a painting of the "Last Judgment," an "Ecce Homo," dated 1510, an engraving of "Mary Magdalene Dancing," and another called "Eulenspiegel," of which, it is said, only five or six proofs are extant. He was an intimate friend of Albert Dürer. Died in 1533.

Leys, līs or lȧ, (JEAN AUGUSTE HENRI,) an eminent Belgian historical painter, born at Antwerp in 1815. He obtained one of the grand medals at the Exposition of Paris in 1855, when he exhibited "The New Year in Flanders," and other pictures. Died August 25, 1869.

Leyser, von, fon lī'zẹr, (AUGUSTIN,) an eminent

German jurist, born at Wittenberg in 1683. He published many legal works, the most important of which is "Thoughts on the Pandects," ("Meditationes ad Pandectas," 11 vols., 1717–47.) Died in 1752.

Leyser, von, written also Lyser, [Lat. LYSE'RUS,] (POLYCARP,) a German Lutheran divine, was born in Würtemberg in 1552. He was appointed professor of theology at Wittenberg in 1576. From 1594 until his death he was the first preacher at the court of Dresden. He published, besides other works, a continuation of Chemnitz's "Harmonia Evangelica." Died in 1610.

Leyssens, lis'sens, (NICOLAAS,) a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp about 1660, worked with success in his native city. Died in 1720.

Leyva, de, dā lā'e-vā, or Leva, lā'vā, (ANTONIO,) one of the ablest generals of the emperor Charles V., was born in Navarre about 1480. He fought at Ravenna in 1512, and distinguished himself at Rebec in 1524. He commanded in Pavía when it was besieged by Francis I. His obstinate defence occasioned the battle of Pavía, (1525,) during which he made a sortie, and, falling upon the rear of the French, decided the fate of the day. In 1532 he was chosen generalissimo of the Italian league against Francis I. He accompanied Charles V. in his expedition against Tunis in 1535, and had the chief direction of the army which invaded Provence in 1536. He died of an epidemic in the same year.

See ROBERTSON, "History of Charles V."

Leyva, de, (JAGO,) a Spanish painter, born about 1580. He studied at Rome, and worked at Burgos. Died in 1637.

Lézardière, de, deh lā'zȧR'de-aiR', (MARIE CHARLOTTE PAULINE ROBERT,) a French female publicist, born in La Vendée in 1754. She produced in 1791 a work of some merit, entitled "Theory of the Political Laws of the French Monarchy," reprinted in 4 vols., 1844. Died in 1835.

Lezay-Marnesia, de, deh leh-zȧ' mȧRN'ze-ȧ', (ADRIEN,) COUNT, a French publicist, born near Orgelet in 1770. He published a tract against the Constitution of 1795, a work "On the Causes of the Revolution," (1797,) and other political treatises. He was prefect of Strasbourg when he died, in 1814.

Lezay-Marnesia, de, (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS ADRIEN,) MARQUIS, the father of the preceding, was born at Metz in 1735. He was a liberal member of the States-General in 1789. He published, besides several prose works, a poem of some merit, called "Essays on Rural Nature," ("Essais sur la Nature champêtre," 1787.) Died in 1800.

L'Héritier de Brutelle, lā're'te-ȧ' deh brü'tĕl', (CHARLES LOUIS,) a French botanist, was born in Paris in 1746. He was admitted into the court of aids in 1775. After the Revolution he was twice appointed a judge of the civil tribunal of Paris. His principal works are "New or Rare Plants," ("Stirpes novæ aut minus cognitæ," 1784,) and "Sertum Anglicum," (1788,) a description of plants in the royal garden of Kew, in England. "His works," says Cuvier, "are prized throughout Europe for the exactitude of the descriptions and the finish of the plates." He left in manuscript a "Flora of Peru," which he compiled from the notes and herbal of Dombey. He was assassinated near his house in 1800. Neither the author nor the motive of this crime was ever discovered.

See CUVIER, "Éloge de L'Héritier," in the "Mémoires de l'Institut;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

L'Héritier de Villandon, lā're'te-ȧ' deh ve'lôN'dôN', (MARIE JEANNE,) a French authoress, born in Paris in 1664, wrote in prose and verse. Died in 1734.

L'Hermite, lĕR'mĕt', (FRANÇOIS,) a popular French poet and dramatist, known under the name of TRISTAN, was born in La Marche in 1601. He was admitted into the French Academy in 1649. Died in 1655.

L'Homond or Lhomond, lo'môN', (CHARLES FRANÇOIS,) a French teacher, born at Chaulnes in 1727, was a professor in the University of Paris. He was a friend of the eminent Haüy, whose first scientific efforts he directed. He published two elementary works which are used in many schools of France, England, and America, viz., "Viri Romæ," and "Epitome of Sacred History," ("Epitome Historiæ Sacræ.") Died in 1794.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

L'Hôpital, de, deh lō'pe'tȧl', (FRANÇOIS,) Comte de Rosnay, a marshal of France, born in 1583, was a brother of Marshal de Vitry. As lieutenant-general, he commanded in Lorraine, where he gained several victories between 1638 and 1642. He received a marshal's bâton in 1643, and was selected to advise the young Prince of Condé, who had just taken command of the army in Flanders. Against the orders of the ministry and the advice of L'Hôpital, Condé risked a battle at Rocroy in 1643, and gained a victory over the Spaniards. Died in 1660.

See DE COURCELLES, "Dictionnaire des Généraux Français."

L'Hôpital or L'Hospital, de, (GUILLAUME FRANÇOIS ANTOINE,) Marquis de Saint-Mesme and Count d'Entremont, a distinguished French geometer, was born in Paris in 1661. At the age of fifteen he is said to have been a profound mathematician. In early life he was forced to renounce the military profession by the weakness of his sight. In 1692 he learned from John Bernoulli the new geometry which Leibnitz had discovered. He was admitted into the Academy of Sciences about 1694. In 1696 Bernoulli challenged the geometers of Europe to a trial of skill in the problem of the brachystochron,—i.e. line or curve of quickest descent. At the expiration of the stated time (ten months) solutions were furnished by only four persons,—Newton, Leibnitz L'Hôpital, and James Bernoulli. The result was the paradoxical cycloïd. In 1696 he published "Analyse des infiniment petits," ("Analysis of Infinitesimals,") which, being the first work adapted to initiate students in the mysteries of the infinitesimal calculus of Leibnitz, was received with great eagerness and marked the epoch of a revolution in the science. He died in 1704. His posthumous work, "Analytic Treatise on Conic Sections," (1707,) had a high reputation.

See FONTENELLE, "Éloge du Marquis de L'Hôpital:" MONTUCLA, "Histoire des Mathématiques:" "Acta Eruditorum," 1721.

L'Hôpital or L'Hospital, de, (MICHEL,) Chancellor of France, an illustrious legislator and statesman, was born at Aigueperse, in Auvergne, in 1505. His father, Jean, was physician to Constable Bourbon, to whom he adhered in his defection from the service of Francis I. to that of Charles V. He studied law at Padua for six years, and about 1534 settled in Paris. Three years later, Morin, lieutenant-criminel, gave him his daughter, and the office of counsellor to the Parliament as her dowry. His promotion was hindered by the connection of his father with the defection of Bourbon, and by his own modesty; but he at last found a patron in Chancellor Olivier, and was appointed ambassador to the Council of Trent in 1547. About 1554 he was chosen by Henry II. superintendent of the finances, in the management of which he made important reforms. In 1560 the regent Catherine de Médicis appointed him chancellor of France. On his arrival at court he found that the chiefs of the house of Guise had resolved to establish the Inquisition and to ruin the Protestants. He defeated the first project, and opposed the other with partial success. He caused the States-General to be convoked at Orléans in December, 1560, and obtained edicts favourable to liberty or toleration. But, in spite of his mediatorial efforts, the war between Catholics and Protestants began in 1562. His advice was no longer listened to at court, and he was removed from office in 1568. He was at his country-seat at Vignay during the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, and his life was spared through the mediation of a lady at court. He died in 1573, leaving a name greatly venerated for wisdom and integrity. As a statesman and legislator he holds a high rank. His political principles are announced in a Latin poem, (composed on occasion of the coronation of Francis II.,) which was much admired. He wrote other elegant Latin poems and discourses, which have been published.

L'Hôpital, de, (MICHEL HURAULT,) Seigneur de Belesbat, was a grandson of the preceding. He was chancellor of Henry of Navarre before the latter became King of France, (1589.) He was also employed by Henry as ambassador to Holland and Germany, and wrote two able political treatises "On the State of France," (1588–93.) Died in 1592.

L'Hôte or Lhôte, lōt, (NESTOR,) an artist and antiquary, born of French parents at Cologne in 1804. He was a member of the commission sent in 1828 to explore Egypt under the direction of Champollion, who employed him as draughtsman. In 1838 he made further explorations and illustrations of Egypt, for the purpose of rendering more complete Champollion's posthumous work on the monuments of that country. Died in Paris in 1842.

Lhoyd, loid, written also Lhuyd and Llwyd, (HUMPHRY,) a learned British antiquary, was born at Denbigh, in Wales. He wrote a "History of Cambria from Caradoc," "On Mona, the Island of the Druids," ("De Monâ Druidum Insulâ,") and other works. Died about 1570.

See WOOD. "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Lhuyd, commonly pronounced loid, (EDWARD,) an eminent Welsh antiquary, born in Carmarthenshire about 1665. He became keeper of the Ashmolean Museum in 1690. He published a catalogue of the figured fossils of the Ashmolean Museum, called "Lythophylacii Britannici Iconographia," (1699,) and a treatise on British antiquities, "Archæologia Britannica," (1707.) Died in 1709.

Li-bā'nI-us, [Gr. Λιβάνιος,] a celebrated heathen sophist and rhetorician, born at Antioch in 314 A.D. He studied with Diophantes of Athens and others. After he had taught rhetoric for several years at Constantinople and Athens with success, he settled in 354 at Antioch, where he opened a school, which became very celebrated. Among his pupils were Saint Basil and Saint Chrysostom. He accepted the office of quæstor from the emperor Julian, who was his friend and admirer. He died probably about 390 A.D., leaving many works, which are still extant, and display a brilliant imagination. They consist chiefly of declamations on events of Greek history, and have been designated by Gibbon as "the vain and idle compositions of an orator who cultivated the science of words." But this is regarded by other eminent critics as too harsh a judgment.

Libère. See LIBERIUS.

Liberi, lee'bà-ree, (PIETRO,) CAVALIERE, an eminent Italian painter, surnamed LIBERTINO, (le-bĕR-tee'no,) born at Padua in 1605, was a pupil of Padovanino. He pursued his studies in Rome, Parma, Venice, etc., and formed a style in which the characteristics of several schools were united. "He was regarded," says the "Biographie Universelle," "as the most skilful draftsman of the Venetian school." Among his master-pieces are the "Massacre of the Innocents," at Venice, "The General Deluge," "Noah coming out of the Ark," "The Judgment of Paris," and several pictures of Venus nude. His style was sometimes grand and sometimes graceful. It is said that when he worked for connoisseurs his manner was bold and free, but for other patrons he finished his work with much care and precision. Died in 1687.

Libri, dai, dȧ-e lee'bree, (GIROLAMO,) a Venetian painter and illuminator, born at Verona in 1472, was one of the most skilful artists of his time. Among his works are a "Deposition from the Cross," and "The Expulsion of Adam and Eve from Eden." He painted many books for the Church, and excelled in miniature. Died in 1555.

His son FRANCESCO was a promising painter, who died young.

Libri-Carrucci, lee'bree kȧr-root'chee, (GUILLAUME BRUTUS ICILIUS TIMOLÉON,) COUNT, an Italian mathematician, born at Florence in 1803. He became a professor of mathematics at Pisa in 1823, and emigrated to France in 1830. Having been naturalized as a French citizen, he was admitted into the Institute in 1833, and was appointed inspector-general of the libraries of France. On a false charge of purloining books of great value from the public libraries, he was condemned in 1850 to imprisonment for ten years; but he had previously escaped to London. His principal work is a "History of Mathematical Sciences in Italy," (4 vols., 1838–41,) which is highly commended. Died in 1869.

Lichtenberg, lĭK'tĕn-bĕRG', (GEORG CHRISTOPH,) a German savant and witty author, born near Darmstadt in July, 1742. He studied at Göttingen, and made great progress in nearly all departments of knowledge. In 1770 he was appointed professor of philosophy and exact sciences at Göttingen. He visited England, where he associated with the most eminent literati. He wrote excellent scientific articles for two periodicals of Göttingen,—"The Magazine of Science and Literature," (1780–85,) and "The Almanac," (1778–99,) which owed their great success chiefly to him. The charms of his style contributed greatly to the diffusion of a taste for the sciences. He particularly excelled in what in English is called "humour." Among his most popular works is his "Ample Commentary on the Engravings of Hogarth," which he began to publish in 1794, and left unfinished at his death. It abounds in wit and satire, and displays much insight into human nature. His autobiography is said to be the most candid and piquant ever written. Died at Göttingen in 1799. "He is," says Stapfer, "gay without the least trace of levity, versatile and profound without ceasing to be solid and clear." ("Biographie Universelle.")

Lichtenstein, lĭK'tĕn-stīn', (MARTIN HEINRICH KARL,) a German physician and naturalist, born at Hamburg in 1780. About 1802 he became physician to the Governor of Cape Colony, Africa, and in 1810 published "Travels in Southern Africa," (2 vols.,) a valuable contribution to natural history. In 1813 he was appointed director of the Zoological Museum of Berlin, which, under his care, became one of the largest in Europe. His favourite pursuit was ornithology. Died in 1857.

See CALLISEN, "Medicinisches Schriftsteller-Lexikon," (Supplement.)

Lichtenstein, von, fon lĭK'tĕn-stīn', (JOHANN JOSEPH,) PRINCE, a general, the head of one of the most noble families of Austria, was born in Vienna in 1760. After serving in several campaigns against the French, he negotiated the conditions of peace at Presburg in 1805. He distinguished himself at Essling and Wagram in 1809. Died in 1836.

Lichtenstein, von, (JOSEPH WENZEL,) PRINCE, an Austrian general, born in Vienna in 1696. His services in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734 were rewarded with the rank of lieutenant-general. Having been made field-marshal, he commanded the army in Italy in 1746, and gained a victory at Piacenza. He was afterwards employed with success in diplomatic affairs. Died in 1772.

Lichtenstein, von, (ULRIC,) one of the early German poets, was born about 1199. His principal poem, entitled "Frauendienst," though possessing no great literary merit, is a valuable monument of the manners of that time. Died about 1275.

Lichtwer, lĭKt'vĕr, (MAGNUS GOTTFRIED,) one of the most popular German fabulists, was born at Wurzen in 1719. He published the first edition of his "Fables" in 1748, and in the next year removed from Wittenberg to Halberstadt, where he obtained a canonicate. In 1758 he produced another edition of the "Fables." The German critics rank him as a fabulist with Lessing and Gellert, whom perhaps he surpasses in piquancy of style and talent for narration. Died in 1783.

Licinio, le-chee'ne-o, (BERNARDINO,) a painter of the Venetian school, born at Pordenone, was one of the best pupils of Pordenone, who was his relative. He painted portraits and Madonnas. He was living in 1540.

Licinio, (GIOVANNI ANTONIO.) See PORDENONE.

Licinio, (GIULIO,) called IL ROMANO, (ēl ro-mä'no,) an Italian painter, born about 1500, was a nephew of Pordenone. Died at Augsburg in 1561.

Lī-cin'ī-us, (or le-sin'e-us,) (FLAVIUS VALERIUS,) (called by some writers Pub'lius Fla'vius Gale'rius Valeria'nus Licinia'nus,) a Roman emperor, born in Dacia about 263 A.D., was originally a peasant. He rose to the rank of general in the army, and gained the favour of Galerius, who in 307 made him a partner in the empire, with the title of Augustus. In 313 he married Constantia, sister of Constantine the Great, and, having defeated Maximin, became master of all the Eastern provinces. A war soon ensued between him and Constantine, which ended in the complete defeat of Licinius at Chalcedon, near Byzantium, in 323. He was put to death by order of the victor in 324 A.D. He was notorious for cruelty and other vices.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Li-cin'ī-us Căl'vus, (CAIUS,) an eminent Roman orator and poet, son of C. Licinius Macer, was born in 82 B.C. Cicero thought his style was too laboured, but admitted that he had wit, judgment, and much learning. His style was eulogized by Quintilian as grave, chaste, and sometimes vehement. As a poet he was usually ranked with Catullus, and was very popular. His works are all lost except fragments of his poems, which consisted of elegies and epigrams or lampoons. He died about the age of thirty-five.

Li-cin'ī-us Sto'lo, or, more fully, Ca'ius Licin'ius Cal'vus Sto'lo, a Roman legislator, of plebeian family, who effected important changes in the constitution of Rome. In 375 B.C., he and his friend L. Sextius Lateranus were chosen tribunes of the people, and proposed the enactment of these laws: 1st. That in future one of the two consuls chosen annually should be a plebeian, and that no more military tribunes should be appointed; 2d. That no citizen should possess more than five hundred acres (jugera) of public land. These innovations were strenuously resisted by the patricians for about ten years, a period of anarchy, during which Camillus was chosen dictator. The land in question had been acquired by conquest, and had been appropriated by the patricians. The laws above named were passed in 366, and Licinius was elected consul in 364 B.C. He was re-elected in 360, and was fined ten thousand asses in 356 for the violation of his own agrarian law.

Liebig, von, fon lee'big, (JUSTUS,) BARON, one of the greatest chemists of the present century, was born at Darmstadt, in Germany, in May, 1803. He entered the University of Bonn in 1819, and in 1822 went to Paris, where he became acquainted with Humboldt and Gay-Lussac. Favoured by the influence of Humboldt, Liebig obtained in 1824 the appointment of professor of chemistry in the University of Giessen. He founded there the first model laboratory of Germany, which became very celebrated and made that university the central point of attraction to the chemical students of Europe. Although his services have been great in every department of chemical science, he owes his celebrity chiefly to his discoveries in organic chemistry. He produced in 1840 an important work entitled "Organic Chemistry in its Application to Agriculture and Physiology," ("Die organische Chemie in ihrer Anwendung auf Agricultur und Physiologie.") His principal works, besides the above, are "Animal Chemistry, or Chemistry in its Application to Physiology and Pathology," (1842,) "Researches on the Chemistry of Food," (1849,) and a "Dictionary of Chemistry," (5 vols., 1837–51,) in which he was assisted by Wöhler. He received the title of baron in 1845, and accepted the chair of chemistry at Munich in 1852. In 1848 Liebig and Professor Kopp began to issue an annual report on the progress of chemistry. His "Familiar Letters on Chemistry" (1844) are much admired, and are well adapted to render the science popular. His principal works above named have been translated into English and French. Died April 18, 1873.

Liebknecht, (JOHANN GEORG,) a German antiquary, born at Wassungen about 1680, wrote, besides other works, "Discourse on the Great Deluge," ("Discursus de Diluvio Maximo," 1704.) Died in 1749.

Liebknecht, (WILHELM,) a German socialist, was born at Giessen in 1826. He took part in the Polish revolution and the French revolution of 1848, was subsequently imprisoned in Germany, and then exiled. He was elected to the German Reichstag in 1867, and became the editor of "Vorwärts," the leading socialist daily. In 1895 he was imprisoned for four months for lèse-majesté. Died in 1900.

Lieoo- (or Lieou-) Pang, le-oo' pȧng, a Chinese emperor, the founder of the dynasty of Han, was born about 250 B.C. He was proclaimed emperor in 202. One of his generals, named King-Poo, having revolted, a battle was fought, in which Lieoo-Pang gained the victory, but received a wound of which he died in 195 B.C.

Lieutaud, le-uh'tō', (JOSEPH,) a skilful French physician, born in 1703, at Aix, in Provence. He was elected to the Academy of Sciences in 1752. In 1774 he was appointed first physician to Louis XVI. He published, besides other professional works, "Synopsis of Universal Medical Practice," ("Synopsis Universæ Praxeos Medicæ," 1765,) a work of much merit. Died in 1780.

Lieven, de, dẹh lee'vẹn, (DOROTHEA,) PRINCESS, a Russian lady, of German extraction, celebrated for her diplomatic talents and political intrigues, was born in 1784. Her maiden name was BENKENDORF. She went to London about 1812 with her husband, who was Russian ambassador at that court, and acquired much influence by her conversational powers. After 1838 she resided in Paris, where her salon was frequented by many diplomatists, statesmen, etc. She was often called the "Egeria of Guizot." Died in 1857.

Lievens or Livens, (JAN,) an eminent Dutch painter and engraver, born at Leyden in 1607. About 1630 he went to England, and painted portraits of the royal family. He afterwards worked at Antwerp, chiefly on historical subjects, and acquired a high reputation. As an engraver he is said to rival Rembrandt. Died in 1663.

Liezen-Mayer, von, (ALEXANDER,) a German painter, born at Raab, Hungary, in 1839. He studied at Vienna and Munich, won the Munich Academy prize in 1865, and in the same year produced his celebrated painting on the beatification of St. Elizabeth. He subsequently painted many notable scenes from history and from Shakespeare and "Faust." Died February 19, 1898.

Ligario, le-gȧ're-o, (PIETRO,) an Italian painter, born in the Valtellina in 1686; died in 1752.

Lĭ-gā'rĭ-us, (QUINTUS,) a Roman officer, who fought for Pompey in the civil war, and after the battle of Pharsalia renewed the war against Cæsar in Africa. He was pardoned by the victor, but was forbidden to enter Italy. When his friends made efforts to restore him to citizenship, they were opposed by Tubero, who became his public accuser in a trial before the dictator, in 45 or 46 B.C. On this occasion Cicero pronounced his admirable oration "Pro Ligario." Plutarch informs us that Cæsar had resolved to condemn Ligarius, but that in the course of the speech his colour often changed, his frame trembled, and a verdict of acquittal was obtained from him through the transcendent powers of the orator.

Light'foot, (JOHN,) an English divine, eminent as a biblical commentator, was born in Staffordshire in 1602. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar. In 1630 he became rector of Ashley, and in 1642 obtained the living of Saint Bartholomew, in London. He was identified with the Presbyterians during the civil war. About 1644 he was chosen master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and was presented to the living of Great Munden. In Rabbinical literature he had few, if any, superiors. He published "Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ," (1658,) and many Latin commentaries on the Scriptures, one of which is called "Harmony of the Four Evangelists," (1644–50.) Died in 1675.

Lightfoot, (JOHN,) F.R.S., an English botanist, born in Gloucestershire in 1735. He was educated for the church, became chaplain to the Duchess of Portland, and obtained the livings of Sheldon and Gotham. In company with Pennant, he explored the Hebrides about 1772, and published in 1777 a valuable "Flora of Scotland," ("Flora Scotica," 2 vols.,) with excellent figures. His herbal was purchased by the king, and was afterwards consulted with profit by Sir J. E. Smith. Died in 1788.

See PENNANT, "Life of J. Lightfoot."

Lightfoot, (JOSEPH BARBER,) D.D., an English bishop and eminent Biblical scholar and critic, was born in Liverpool in 1828. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1851, took orders in 1854, became a professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1867, canon of Saint Paul's in 1871, Margaret professor at Cambridge in 1875, Bishop of Durham in 1879. He has published revised texts, with notes, etc., of Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, (1869; 4th edition, 1874,) Philippians, (1870; 3d edition, 1873,) and Colossians, (1875,) and of Saint Clement's Epistles to the Corinthians, (1869,) an essay on New Testament Revision, (1871,) and other works of high value. As a scholar Dr. Lightfoot (to use the language of the late Dr. Ezra Abbot) "has no superior among the Germans in breadth of learning or thoroughness of research." [Died December 21, 1889.]

Ligne, de, dẹh lẽñ, (KARL JOSEPH,) PRINCE, an able Austrian general and witty author, born at Brussels, May 12, 1735, was the son of a field-marshal in the Austrian service. He served with distinction in the Seven Years' war, (1755–62,) and was made a general-major in 1765. In 1782 he was ambassador to Russia, and was highly favoured by Catherine II. He commanded a corps at the capture of Belgrade in 1789. He obtained the rank of field-marshal in 1808. His generous and chivalrous character rendered him the idol of his army. He died at Vienna in 1814, leaving interesting memoirs, letters, and other works, (in French,) which contain curious anecdotes and piquant passages. Madame de Staël published in 1809 a volume of "Letters and Thoughts of Prince de Ligne." He had published "Military, Literary, and Sentimental Miscellanies," ("Mélanges militaires, littéraires et sentimentaires," 34 vols., 1795–1811.) According to Madame de Staël, "he was the only foreigner that became a model in the French style, instead of an imitator."

Ligonier, lig'o-neer', (JOHN,) EARL, an eminent general of the British army, was born of Protestant parents in France in 1678, and emigrated to England in early youth. He fought at Blenheim,(1704,) Ramillies, and Malplaquet, (1709,) and commanded the infantry at Fontenoy, (1745.) In 1746 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the British forces in Flanders. He displayed great skill and courage at Laffeldt in 1747, but was there made prisoner. He became an English peer, with the title of Earl Ligonier, in 1766, and was a field-marshal and privy councillor at his death, in 1770.

See MM. HAAG, "La France protestante."

Ligorio, le-go're-o, (PIRRO,) an Italian architect, painter, and antiquary, born in Naples about 1530, or, as others say, 1498. He was appointed by Paul IV. architect of the Vatican and of Saint Peter's Church, which Michael Angelo had previously superintended. The latter left Rome about that time. Ligorio, having deviated from the plan of Michael Angelo, which he was ordered to follow, was discharged in 1568. He then was employed as architect by Alphonso, Duke of Ferrara. He died about 1580, leaving in manuscript voluminous writings on antiquities and architecture, which are praised by Muratori.

Ligozzi, le-got'see, (JACOPO,) an eminent Italian painter of history, born at Verona in 1543, was a pupil of Paul Veronese. He painted both in fresco and in oil. Having acquired a high reputation at Verona, he removed to Florence, where he received the title of painter to the grand duke Ferdinand. Among his master-pieces are "The Four Crowned Saints," at Imola, and the "Martyrdom of Saint Dorothea," at Pescia. His smaller pictures are highly finished. Died in 1627.

Li Hsi, King of Korea, came to the throne in 1864. He was weak and vacillating in character, and fell largely under the control of the Russian agent residing at Seoul.

Li Hung Chang, an eminent Chinese statesman, was born February 16, 1823, and took the Hanlin degree in 1849. He was a secretary in the army during the Taiping rebellion, later a provincial judge, and in 1861 governor of Kiangsu, from which he aided "Chinese" Gordon to drive the rebels in 1863. This service was rewarded with the Yellow Jacket and the Peacock's Feather and the third class of nobility. He was made governor-general of Kiang province in 1864, and of the imperial province of Chihli in 1872, where he became active in founding the Chinese navy. He was made commander-in-chief of army and navy in the war of 1894 with Japan, but was thwarted by the incompetency of his subordinates. In consequence of the defeats he was deprived of his honours, but they were soon restored, and he negotiated a treaty of peace in 1895. In 1896 he visited Europe and America. On his return he was made foreign secretary of the empire, and after the Boxer troubles of 1900 was appointed commissioner to deal with the foreign powers. He is recognized as the most enlightened and progressive of the statesmen of China.

Lil'burne, (JOHN,) an English Puritan enthusiast and radical agitator, was born in Durham in 1618. He was accused before the Star Chamber in 1637 of distributing seditious pamphlets, and was condemned to be whipped and imprisoned. He was released in 1640, and obtained £2000 damages. In 1644 he fought bravely against the king at Marston Moor, where he led a regiment. He afterwards attacked Prynne, Lenthal, and others in pamphlets, for which he was committed to Newgate. He was one of the master-spirits of the "Levellers," and a stubborn opponent of Cromwell's authority. In 1651 he was tried for treason and acquitted by the jury. He became a Quaker a few years before his death, which occurred in 1657. Hume designates him as "the most turbulent, but the most upright and courageous, of human kind." ("History of England.")

Lilienkrantz or Liljenkrantz, lee'le-ẹn-krânts', or Liliecrantz, lee'le-ẹh-krânts', (JOHANN,) COUNT DE, a Swedish financier, born about 1730. On the accession of Gustavus III. (1771) he was appointed minister of finances, which he managed with success for many years. Died in 1815.

See GEVER, "Histoire de la Suède."

Lilienthal, lee'le-ĕn-tăl', (MICHAEL,) a learned Prussian philologist, born at Liebstadt in 1686. He was for many years professor of theology in the University of Königsberg. He was the principal editor of the "Erläutertes Preussen," (1724–28,) a highly-esteemed literary journal, and published, besides other works, "Historical and Literary Selections," ("Selecta Historica et Literaria," 1711–19.) Died in 1750.

Lilienthal, (THEODOR CHRISTIAN,) a German theologian and writer, a son of the preceding, was born at Königsberg in 1717; died in 1782.

Lilio, lee'le-o, or Lilli, lĭl'lee, (ANDREA,) an Italian painter, born at Ancona in 1555. He worked at Rome for Sixtus V., and at Ancona. Died in 1610.

Lilio, (LUIGI,) [Lat. ALOY'SIUS LIL'IUS,] an Italian physician and astronomer, born in Calabria. He is remembered only for the part he had in the reform of the calendar under the auspices of Gregory XIII. He applied the epacts to the cycle of nineteen years, and, by adding one day to the end of each cycle, he arrived at an approximative equation of the solar and lunar years. He died in 1576, just after he had finished the work. His method was approved by the pope in 1582

Liliuokalani, (LYDIA KAMEKEHA,) ex-Queen of Hawaii, born at Honolulu, December 2, 1838. She was proclaimed queen January 29, 1891, on the death of King Kalakaua. Her attempts to abolish constitutional government and rule as an absolute monarch led to a revolt of the American inhabitants and her dethronement in 1892. An attempt to regain her power failed and she sought the United States, but returned to Hawaii in August, 1898, after its annexation by the United States government.

Lillie, (LUCY CECIL,) an American author, born (White) at New York city in 1855. She wrote "Mildred's Bargain," "The Colonel's Money," "The Story of English Literature," etc.

Lil'lo, (GEORGE,) a successful English dramatist, born in 1693, became a jeweller of London. He holds a high rank among English dramatists of the second order. "The Fatal Curiosity," a tragedy, (1737,) is called his master-piece, and is constructed with remarkable skill. His "George Barnwell" and "Arden of Feversham" were also popular. Died in 1739.

Lil'ly, written also Lily and Lyly, (JOHN,) an English dramatic writer, born in Kent about 1553. He wrote several dramas, which were performed with success, and flourished as a wit at the court of Elizabeth. About 1580 he published "Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit," which became very popular with that pedantic generation for its affected and dainty style, called "Euphuism." "It deserves notice," says Hallam, "on account of the influence it is recorded to have had upon the court of Elizabeth and over the public taste." He was the author of a famous satirical pamphlet against Martin Mar-Prelate, called "Pap with a Hatchet." Died about 1600.

Lilly, (WILLIAM,) a famous English astrologer, born in Leicestershire in 1602. In early life he was employed as a servant in London. He began to study astrology in 1632, and acquired fame as a fortune-teller. He profited by the credulity of Charles I., who consulted him on political affairs in the civil war. Some agents of the popular party also patronized him. He published annually an almanac, called "Merlinus Anglicus Junior," (1644–81.) His character is represented by Butler under the name of "Sidrophel." Died in 1681.

Lilly, (WILLIAM SAMUEL,) an English author, born at Fifehead in 1840. He graduated at Cambridge in 1861, was in the India service till 1870, became a London barrister in 1873, and secretary of the Catholic Union of Great Britain in 1874. He published "Ancient Religion and Modern Thought," (1884,) "A Century of Revolution," (1889,) "Claims of Christianity," (1894,) etc.

Lil'ў or Lil'lў, (WILLIAM,) a distinguished English schoolmaster, born at Odiham, in Hampshire, about 1468. After studying languages in Greece and Rome, he settled in London in 1509, and opened a grammar-school. He appears to have been the first who taught Greek in London. In 1512 he became master of Saint Paul's School, just founded by Colet. He published, besides Latin poems, "Brevissima Institutio seu Ratio Grammatices cognoscendæ," (1513,) commonly called "Lily's Grammar," which was for a long time more used in English schools than any other Latin grammar. He was intimate with Erasmus. Died in 1523.

Limayrac, le'mą'rȧk', (PAULIN,) a French littérateur, born at Caussade in 1817. He became chief editor of "La Patrie," a daily paper of Paris, in 1858. Died 1868.

Limborch, van, vȧn lim'borĸ', written also Limborg, (HENDRIK,) a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1680, was one of the best pupils of Adrian van der Werf, of whose works he made fine copies. Died in 1758.

Limborch, van, (PHILIPPUS,) a learned Dutch theologian, was born in Amsterdam the 19th of June, 1633. He was one of the principal supporters of the Remonstrant or Arminian doctrines, which were condemned by the Synod of Dort in 1619. After preaching for ten years at Gouda, he became in 1668 pastor and professor of theology at Amsterdam. He corresponded for a long time with John Locke. His most important work is "Theologia Christiana," (1686,) "a system of divinity and morals which," says Hallam, "is the fullest delineation of the Arminian scheme." He wrote a "History of the Inquisition," (1692.) Died in 1712.

Limbourg, van, vȧn lim'bo͝oRG', (JAN PHILIPPUS,) a Flemish medical writer, born near Spa in 1726. He practised at Spa with great success. Died in 1811.

Linacre, lin'ą-kẹr, written also Linacer (or Linaker) and Lynacer, (THOMAS,) an eminent English physician and scholar, born at Canterbury about 1460. He learned Greek of Demetrius Chalcondylas at Florence, and studied medicine at Rome. After his return to England he lectured on medicine, and taught Greek at Oxford for several years, until Henry VIII. employed him as physician and preceptor of Prince Arthur. He was the principal founder and first president of the College of Physicians, London. At an advanced age he took orders, and obtained the rectory of Mersham, a prebend in York Cathedral, and other benefices. He was an excellent classical scholar, and a correspondent of Erasmus. He translated several of Galen's works into Latin, and wrote "On the Correct Structure of Latin Prose," ("De Emendata Structura Latini Sermonis,") which Hallam calls "the first-fruits of English erudition," and which must, he says, have been highly valuable. Died in 1524.

Linant, le'nôN', (MICHEL,) a French littérateur, born at Louviers in 1708. Voltaire, who was his friend, spoke highly of his taste and imagination. Linant lived in Paris, and was employed as tutor to the sons of M. Hébert. He wrote odes, epistles, and other short poems, which gained several prizes of the French Academy. He also published an edition of Voltaire's works, (1738.) Died in 1749.

Linck, link, (JOHANN HEINRICH,) a German naturalist, born at Leipsic in 1674; died in 1734.

Lincke, link'ẹh, (JOSEPH,) a Prussian violoncellist and composer, born June 8, 1783, at Trachenberg, in Silesia. Died March 26, 1837.

Lincoln, link'ọn, (ABRAHAM,) the sixteenth President of the United States, was born in Hardin county, Kentucky, (in a part now included in Larue county,) the 12th of February, 1809. His ancestors were of English descent; they are supposed to have originally emigrated to America with the followers of William Penn. A little before the middle of last century they resided in Berks county, Pennsylvania, whence a part of the family removed in 1750 to Virginia. About the year 1780 Abraham Lincoln, the grandfather of the subject of this notice, settled in Kentucky, where not long after he was stealthily shot by an Indian. He left three sons, of whom the eldest, Thomas Lincoln, married and settled in Hardin county in 1806. Abraham Lincoln was his second child and oldest son. His childhood was passed in the midst of hardship and toil. When he was scarcely eight years old, his parents removed to Spencer county, Indiana. It was a difficult and wearisome journey, and he ever afterwards retained a vivid recollection of the trials and hardships which he passed through on that occasion. Before he was eleven years of age, he experienced a bitter and irreparable loss in the death of his mother. Under her guidance he had learned to read and prize the Bible, and to her influence, there is reason to believe, he was largely indebted for the development of those rare and noble moral traits which have conferred upon him, if not a brilliant, at least a spotless and ever-enduring fame. Among the books which, as a boy, he particularly valued, was a Life of Washington; and it is not improbable that the contemplation of such a character, which united to plain and practical common sense moral qualities of the highest order, may have contributed not a little to that combination of straightforward simplicity and moral grandeur for which Lincoln was afterwards distinguished. The "Pilgrim's Progress" was also one of his favourite books; and its influence upon his style may perhaps be traced not merely in his preference for forcible and racy Saxon words, but also in that homely directness of expression by which all his speeches and writings are characterized.

On the breaking out of the Black Hawk war, in the early part of 1832, Lincoln promptly volunteered for the defence of the frontier settlements, and was chosen captain of his company. The war, however, having been speedily brought to a close before he had an opportunity of meeting the enemy, he returned to the pursuits of peace. In the political contest which took place between General Jackson and Henry Clay in the autumn of 1832, he zealously espoused the cause of the latter, for whom he had felt an enthusiastic admiration from his boyhood. He himself was a candidate for the State legislature; and, although unsuccessful, he received in his own precinct two hundred and seventy-seven votes out of the two hundred and eighty-four which had been cast; that is, thirty-nine fortieths of the whole number. In 1834 he was again a candidate for the legislature, and was elected. He was re-elected in 1836. In March, 1837, he gave proof of the uprightness as well as independence of his character by recording his protest on the journal of the House against some extreme pro-slavery resolutions which had been passed by the Democratic majority in the legislature. At that time the expression of any anti-slavery sentiments was extremely unpopular in every part of the United States, but perhaps nowhere north of Mason and Dixon's line was it more so than in Illinois. Lincoln and another member who shared his views declared in their protest that "they believe that the institution of slavery is founded in injustice and bad policy." Having been again elected to the legislature in 1838, he became the acknowledged leader of the Whigs in the House, and received the entire vote of his party for the speakership, which he lost by only one vote. He had been admitted to the bar in 1836, and in April, 1837, he established himself permanently in Springfield and commenced the practice of law in earnest, with John T. Stuart as his partner. In November, 1842, he married Miss Mary Todd, daughter of Robert S. Todd, Esq., of Lexington, Kentucky. Having accepted the nomination for Congress in 1846, he was triumphantly elected, being the only Whig out of the seven representatives sent by Illinois to the national legislature. During the time that he was in Congress he uniformly gave his voice in favour of freedom, voting against laying on the table without consideration the petitions for the abolition of slavery, and always supporting the doctrines of the Wilmot Proviso whenever any measure of this kind was before the House. The passage of the Nebraska bill in May, 1854, involving the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, gave everywhere fresh interest and ardour to the contest between freedom and slavery. A United States Senator was to be chosen by the Illinois legislature. Lincoln had been nominated by the Republican party as their candidate for the Senate of the United States. Judge Douglas, confessedly the ablest politician and best debater among all the Democratic leaders of the West, was the opposing candidate. Lincoln challenged his opponent to a series of public discussions respecting the views and policy of the two contending parties. That political contest first fully revealed the versatility, depth, and comprehensiveness of Mr. Lincoln's mind. Even some of those belonging to the party of Judge Douglas admitted that the latter was inferior to his opponent both in learning and in argument,—in short, in every essential qualification for the discussion of those great principles which were then agitating the country from one extremity to the other. As the election of United States Senator depended on the legislature, and not on a direct vote by the people, Douglas was the successful competitor; but the extraordinary ability displayed by Lincoln in the discussion above referred to, led to his nomination by the Republican party in 1860 as their candidate for the Presidency. No Presidential contest involving issues so momentous had ever before occurred. The general election then about to take place was to decide the all-important question whether the blighting influence of slavery should be allowed to extend to every part of the republic, or should thenceforward be restricted to the territory which it already possessed. Never before had any Presidential election so strongly excited all the hopes and fears of the patriot, all the affections and passions of the people. It took place on the 6th of November, 1860. Lincoln received the electoral votes of all the free States except New Jersey, which was divided, giving him four votes and Douglas three. Breckinridge received the votes of all the slave States except Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri; the three former voted for Bell, the last for Douglas. Lincoln received in all one hundred and eighty electoral votes, Breckinridge seventy-two, Bell thirty-nine, and Douglas twelve.

No sooner was the result of the election known than several of the Southern States made preparations for formally separating themselves from the Federal Union. South Carolina took the lead in the secession movement. The legislature convened in November and passed an act calling a State convention to meet on the 17th of December. It met accordingly, and on the 20th an ordinance was passed unanimously dissolving the union till then "subsisting between South Carolina and other States under the name of the United States of America." It was evident, from the language of the leading men in that convention, that the ordinance of secession was not the result of any sudden excitement or hastily-adopted resolution, but was the deliberate fulfilment of a settled and long-cherished purpose. "The secession of South Carolina," said Mr. Rhett, "was not the event of a day." It was "a matter which had been gathering head for thirty years." Mr. Inglis said that most of them had had it "under consideration for the last twenty years." "So far," says Raymond, "as South Carolina was concerned, there can be no doubt that her action was decided by men who had been plotting disunion for thirty years, not on account of any wrongs her people had sustained at the hands of the Federal government, but from motives of personal and sectional ambition, and for the purpose of establishing a government which should be permanently and completely in the interest of slavery." ("Lincoln's Administration," chap. i.) Following the example of South Carolina, Mississippi passed an ordinance of secession on the 9th of January, 1861,* Florida January 10, Alahama January 11, Georgia January 18, Louisiana January 26, Texas February 1. Thus, more than a month previous to the expiration of Mr. Buchanan's term of office, seven States had done all that lay in their power to dissolve their connection with the Union. Delegates appointed by the conventions of the seceding States met at Montgomery early in February, and formed a new Confederacy, of which Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, was elected President, and Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, Vice-President. Not long after, Mr. Stephens, in an elaborate speech addressed to the people of Savannah, attempted to vindicate the course of the seceders in setting up a new government in opposition to that of the United States. On that occasion he said that the prevailing ideas of Jefferson and "most of the leading statesmen at the time of the formation of the old Constitution were that the enslavement of the African was a violation of the laws of nature, that it was wrong in principle, socially, morally, politically. . . . These ideas, however, were fundamentally wrong. They rested upon the assumption of the equality of races. This was an error. . . . Our new government was founded upon exactly the opposite ideas; its foundations are laid, its corner-stone rests, upon the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery, subordination to the superior race, is his natural and normal condition. This, our new government, is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth."

While President Buchanan took the ground that the Federal government had no right to coerce the seceding States, several members of the cabinet had not neglected the opportunities which their official position afforded, of promoting the interests of the Southern Confederacy. The secretary of war, John B. Floyd, took care to make such a disposition of the Federal arms and ammunition that in case the new administration should be disposed to adopt a more decisive policy it would find its energies paralyzed by a total want of the material of war, while the revolted States, in case of necessity, might readily possess themselves of that very material which had been thus adroitly placed beyond the reach of the Federal government. An official report from the ordnance department, dated January 16, 1861, shows that during the year 1860 115,000 muskets had been removed from Northern armories and sent to Southern arsenals by a single order of the secretary of war; and it was claimed for him, by one of his eulogists in Virginia, that, while a member of President Buchanan's cabinet, Mr. Floyd "thwarted, resisted, and forbade" certain measures which, if carried into effect, would have rendered the formation of the Southern Confederacy impossible.

It was under such circumstances as these—with seven or the most influential of the United States in open revolt, and several others on the eve of secession,—with timorous indecision at the head of the government, and secret treason lurking not only among the members of the cabinet, but also among the officers of the army and navy—that Abraham Lincoln, on the 11th of February, 1861, left his Western home and proceeded to Washington to take into his hands the reins of government. His brief parting words to his friends at Springfield reveal at one view the simple, manly earnestness of his character, and that humble but unfaltering trust in God by which he was sustained through all the perils and darkness which surrounded his administration. "My Friends: No one not in my position can appreciate the sadness I feel at this parting. To this people I owe all that I am. Here I have lived more than a quarter of a century; here my children were born, and here one of them lies buried. I know not how soon I shall see you again. A duty devolves upon me which is, perhaps, greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He never would have succeeded except for the aid of divine Providence, upon which he at all times relied. I feel that I cannot succeed without the same divine aid which sustained him; and on the same almighty Being I place my reliance for support; and I hope you, my friends, will all pray that I may receive that divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which success is certain. Again I bid you all an affectionate farewell."

A rumour was current some time before the President-elect left his home in Illinois, that he would never reach the national capital alive. An attempt was made (February 11) on the Toledo and Western Railroad to throw from the track the train on which he was; and afterwards, just as he was leaving Cincinnati, a hand-grenade was found to have been secreted on the car. A plot had likewise been formed to take his life during his passage through Baltimore on his way to Washington. Mr. Seward and General Scott, having been informed of that fact, arranged it that Lincoln should pass through Baltimore several hours earlier than had at first been proposed. The plans of the conspirators were thus frustrated, and the President-elect reached Washington in safety on the morning of the 23d of February.

Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated as President of the United States on the 4th of March, 1861. In his address on that occasion he mildly but distinctly and firmly announced his purpose to "take care that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States." "I trust," he adds, "this will not be regarded as a menace. . . . There need be no bloodshed or violence; and there shall be none, unless it be forced upon the national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the government, and to collect the duties and imposts; but, beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people, anywhere. . . . The mails, unless repelled, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union. So far as possible, the people everywhere shall have that sense of perfect security which is most favourable to calm thought and reflection. . . . Physically speaking, we cannot separate. We cannot remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other; but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face; and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make the intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? . . . THE CHIEF MAGISTRATE DERIVES ALL HIS AUTHORITY FROM THE PEOPLE; AND THEY HAVE CONFERRED NONE UPON HIM TO FIX TERMS FOR THE SEPARATION OF THE STATES. . . . HIS DUTY IS TO ADMINISTER THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT AS IT CAME INTO HIS HANDS, AND TO TRANSMIT IT UNIMPAIRED BY HIM TO HIS SUCCESSOR.

"My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time; but no good object can be frustrated by it. . . .

"In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war . . . You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to 'preserve, protect, and defend' it." Mr. Lincoln did not deny that the laws of the Federal government, and even the Constitution itself, might perhaps bear unequally and hardly upon some sections of the country; but he thought that all grievances of this kind would be far more likely to be properly redressed through a calm and friendly appeal to the sense of justice in the people than by violence or war.

It was enough, however, for the slave-holding party that he denied not merely the expediency but the right of any State or sectional combination of States to secede. This was considered equivalent to a declaration of war; and active preparations for the coming struggle were at once commenced throughout the seceded States. The moderate, reasonable, and conciliatory tone of the Inaugural had, it cannot be doubted, a most happy effect, not only in uniting and consolidating, so to speak, the public sentiment of the North, but also in encouraging all those in the border States who, whatever may have been their views in relation to slavery, had not yet cast off all attachment to the national flag and the Federal Union. Fort Sumter, in the harbour of Charleston, was occupied by a United States garrison, under the command of Major Anderson. General Beauregard, on the part of the Southern Confederacy, demanded its surrender. To this demand, which was made on the 11th of April, Major Anderson at once replied that his "sense of honour and his obligations to his government prevented his compliance." Early on the 12th an attack on the fort was commenced, and kept up with the utmost fury with shells and red-hot cannon-balls, in consequence of which Major Anderson, after a gallant resistance of thirty-three hours, was at length obliged to evacuate the place, which he did on the morning of the 14th. The bombardment of Fort Sumter was the first aggressive act committed on either side. It produced a deep and intense excitement throughout the Northern States, breaking down for a time all party distinctions, and uniting the whole people in an earnest, unfaltering purpose to support the government.* The President, justly regarding this unprovoked attack upon a United States fort as the commencement of actual war, issued on the next day (April 15) a proclamation directing both Houses of Congress to meet in extra session on the 4th of July following, and calling out "the militia of the several States of the Union, to the aggregate number of 75,000," for the purpose of supporting the authority and enforcing the laws of the Federal Union. It was not, however, merely for maintaining the authority of the government that troops were needed, but for the defence of the national capital itself. The President of the Southern Confederacy had declared, more than a month before, that whenever war should commence the North and not the South should be the battle-field; and the recent attack on Fort Sumter was a sufficient proof that no veneration for the national flag nor any lurking scruples of any kind would be likely to prevent the carrying out of that threat if it were possible to accomplish it. All the Northern States responded to the demand of President Lincoln with the utmost alacrity and zeal. Massachusetts—be it said to her immortal honour—was the first in the field. The next day after the issue of the proclamation, her Sixth regiment left Boston for the national capital. Two more regiments set out within forty-eight hours. The Sixth regiment was attacked (April 19) in Baltimore by a mob carrying a secession flag, and several of the soldiers were killed or severely wounded. Governor Hicks having united with Mayor Brown, of Baltimore, in urging, for prudential reasons, that no more troops should be brought through that city, it was arranged that those needed for the defence of Washington should in future be sent thither by way of Annapolis. On the 19th of April President Lincoln issued a proclamation blockading the ports of the seceded States. The excitement caused by the bombardment of Fort Sumter, which tended so powerfully to unite public sentiment at the North, appeared to have produced a still greater effect in the Southern States, where the enthusiasm of the people was inflamed almost to frenzy by what seemed the brilliant success of the Confederates, in reducing so quickly a fortress which was regarded as one of the strongest in the United States, though it was at that time feebly garrisoned and supplied with provisions for a few days only. Yielding to this whirlwind of excitement, the legislature of Virginia, on the 17th of April, (three days after the taking of Fort Sumter,) passed an ordinance of secession by a vote of 88 to 55. Not long after, the State Convention of North Carolina, elected during the excitement which followed the capture of Sumter, passed unanimously an ordinance of secession.

* The very next day after Major Anderson had evacuated the ruins of Fort Sumter, a leading journal of New York (the "Tribune") aptly and forcibly observed, "Fort Sumter is lost, but freedom is saved. . . . It is hard to lose Sumter; it is a consolation to know that in losing it we have gained a united people."

The most active preparations were made on both sides for the contest which was now inevitable. In the seceding States more than a hundred thousand troops had been raised, of which the larger portion had been marched towards the Northern border. The greatness of the force arrayed against the government made an additional supply of troops necessary for the security of the national capital. A second proclamation was issued on the 3d of May, calling into the United States service a large number of volunteers, and greatly increasing the force both of the army and navy. The difficulties surrounding the new administration were rendered still more formidable by the precipitate action of the French and English governments, which, as soon as information was received that hostilities had actually begun in America, determined, in concert, to acknowledge the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent power.

In accordance with the proclamation of the 15th of April, Congress met in extra session, July 4, 1861. In the message which on that occasion the President addressed to the Senators and representatives, after reviewing the condition of the country and explaining the course of the government, he proceeds to say,—

"It is thus seen that the assault upon and reduction of Fort Sumter was in no sense a matter of self-defence upon the part of the assailants. They well knew that the garrison in the fort could by no possibility commit aggression upon them. They knew, they were expressly notified, that the giving of bread to the few brave and hungry men of the garrison was all which would on that occasion be attempted, unless themselves, by resisting so much, should provoke more. They knew that this government desired to keep the garrison in the fort, not to assail them, but to maintain visible possession, and thus to preserve the Union from actual and immediate dissolution, trusting, as before stated, to time, discussion, and the ballot-box for final adjustment; and they assailed and reduced the fort for precisely the reverse object, to drive out the visible authority of the Federal Union and thus force it to immediate dissolution. . . . In this act, discarding all else, they have forced upon the country the distinct issue, 'immediate dissolution or blood.'

"And this issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy—a government of the people by the same people—can or cannot maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes. . . .

"It was with the deepest regret that the Executive found the duty of employing the war-power in defence of the government forced upon him. He could but perform this duty or surrender the existence of the government. . . . As a private citizen, the Executive could not have consented that these institutions should perish; much less could he, in betrayal of so vast and so sacred a trust as these free people have confided to him. He felt that he had no right to shrink, or even to count the chances of his own life, in what might follow."

There were a few members in both Houses who insisted that any employment of the war-power against the rebels was unconstitutional; but the general sentiment of Congress fully sustained the President in the course he had taken. On July 15, Mr. McClernand, a Democratic member from Illinois, offered a resolution pledging the House to vote any amount of money and any number of men necessary to suppress the rebellion and restore the authority of the government. This resolution was adopted with but five dissenting votes. The spirited action of Congress seemed to inspire the people everywhere throughout the North with renewed hope and confidence. Towards the latter part of June, a large rebel force had occupied a strong position on Bull Run Creek, near Manassas. It was resolved on the part of the Federal government to attack and drive back this force; and the belief was generally entertained that a single decided success on the part of the Union armies would put an end to the war. The Federal forces, commanded by General McDowell, made an attack upon the position of the rebels on the 21st of July; but they met with a disastrous defeat, and were driven back in great disorder towards Washington. Then, for the first time, the Northern States realized the greatness of the conflict which was before them. They then understood how great were the advantages possessed by the Confederates in consequence of their having been for years preparing for war. No inconsiderable portion of their troops had been thoroughly disciplined under excellent officers, while many of the Northern troops had scarcely any discipline at all. Add to this that a large proportion of the best and most experienced officers in the regular army of the United States had resigned their commissions and joined the Confederate cause. All the principal Confederate officers, with scarcely an exception, had been educated at the national military academy at West Point, and had afterwards held important positions in the regular army. It may suffice to cite the names of Generals Joseph E. and Albert Sydney Johnston, Jefferson Davis, the President of the Southern Confederacy, and General Robert E. Lee, regarded, at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion, as by far the ablest officer in the United States army, General Scott having become through age and infirmities unequal to the duties of the field. But the disaster of Bull Run damped the hopes of the Unionists for a moment only. After the first surprise was over, its effect was to rouse the courage and determination of the people to the highest point. Volunteers flocked by thousands to join the national army. From the time of Lincoln's inauguration, through all the anxious months of the spring and summer of 1861, General Scott had retained his position as commander of the armies of the United States, and had given the government the benefit of his wisdom and experience and the support of his great influence and unwavering loyalty. At length, on the 31st of October, in consequence of ill health and advancing age, he applied to the secretary of war to be released from active service. He was accordingly placed upon the list of retired officers of the army of the United States, but retaining his full pay, according to a special provision passed by Congress in the summer session. At the recommendation of General Scott, General McClellan, who had obtained marked distinction by his success during the summer of 1861 in clearing Western Virginia of rebel troops, was called to Washington and appointed to the command of the Federal forces. He at once commenced a thorough reorganization of the army, and before many months brought it into a state of high and efficient discipline. Unfortunately, his sympathies were rather with the moderate slaveholders than with the staunch supporters of the government, and, when it became necessary to sacrifice slavery in order to save the republic, he could not nerve himself to the task. In a war of a different kind, requiring simply vigilance, skill, and the spirit of conciliation, he might have earned enduring laurels. But the Confederates had gone too far to be won back by conciliation. As nothing could satisfy them short of breaking up the Union, so nothing was left for the Federal government, if it would escape general disruption and utter ruin, but to suppress the rebellion by force of arms.

The forces under the immediate command of General McClellan having remained inactive during most of the winter of 1861–62, President Lincoln issued on the 27th of January, 1862, an order that on the 22d of February a general movement against the insurgents should be made by the land and naval forces of the United States. General McClellan at first objected, in a letter to the secretary of war, to the plan of operations which he had been directed to pursue. At length, on the 13th of March, a council of war was held, in which it was decided to advance against Richmond from Fortress Monroe. The army was conveyed by water down the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay to the mouth of James River. Soon after the commencement of the campaign, General McClellan began to complain that he was not properly supported by the Executive at Washington. Advancing into the heart of a hostile country, where his enemies, by means of the railroads, which they could completely control, might concentrate, at a very short notice, all their available force at or near the point of threatened attack, it behooved him, undoubtedly, to use great circumspection. Unhappily, the extreme precautions which he took against a doubtful or contingent peril had no other effect than to surround him with real dangers of the most formidable character. His movements were so slow and hesitating that the Confederates not only had time to assemble their forces from distant points and erect extensive fortifications, but even to raise and discipline large reinforcements of fresh troops. Had he early in April advanced with his army against Yorktown, he would have met with a feeble resistance, and might, in all probability, have pushed on at once to the conquest of Richmond. But he decided to approach it by a regular siege; extensive earthworks were thrown up, and the campaign was protracted into the hottest part of the summer. His troops, compelled to encamp among the swamps adjacent to the Chickahominy, perished in great numbers from disease. At last, after a series of sanguinary but indecisive conflicts, the army was forced to retreat. It was moved in August from James River by water to Aquí'a Creek, on the Potomac, some forty miles below Washington. About the same time the army of General Pope, after several days of hard fighting near Manassas and Centreville, was driven back with heavy loss upon Washington. There was perhaps no darker period during the whole war than that in which the summer of 1862 came to a close; and we may safely say that no one throughout the land felt more deeply the reverses and sufferings of his countrymen than President Lincoln.

On the 2d of September, General McClellan took command of all the available troops for the defence of the capital. General Lee, having crossed the Potomac (September 5) into Maryland, was attacked and defeated by McClellan at Antietam on the 16th and 17th of September. He retreated into Virginia, and was not pursued. Early in October McClellan was ordered to cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy or drive him southward; but, having delayed his advance for about three weeks, he was removed from his command, by an order dated November 5. General Burnside, who succeeded McClellan as commander of the army of the Potomac, attacked (December 13) General Lee, then occupying a strongly-fortified position at Fredericksburg, and was repulsed with severe loss. Again, on the 2d and 3d of May, 1863, General Hooker was worsted by General Lee in a very hard-fought battle at Chancellorsville. The great and repeated disasters experienced by the Union armies from the beginning of the war, but more particularly those of the summer of 1862, appear to have prepared the people of the Northern States for the adoption of a more radical policy on the part of the government. At first it had been the aim of the Executive to preserve the Union with all the provisions of the Constitution as it was originally adopted. But, the slaveholders having by their rebellion forfeited all claim to the protection of that instrument, it might become expedient or necessary to assail them on the side where they were confessedly weakest,—viz., through the institution of slavery. President Lincoln had been censured by some for not taking a more decided position on the subject of slavery at the commencement of the war; but he had very strong reasons for the line of policy which he had hitherto thought proper to pursue. So powerful was the influence, so plausible the arguments, brought by the Confederates to bear upon the border States, that it was only with the greatest difficulty that Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri could be prevented from following Virginia and North Carolina and joining the rebellion. If, then, the Federal government, with those States standing neutral or divided, was able to re-establish its authority only after years of conflict and the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives, what might have been the issue had those four populous and warlike States from the very commencement of the war been closely and firmly united with the Confederacy? Had President Lincoln at once, on the breaking out of the rebellion, attempted the overthrow of slavery, there is reason to believe that all the above-named States would have arrayed themselves against the government, and the theatre of war, instead of being almost exclusively confined to the territory of the slave States, would, in all probability, have been extended to the adjacent free States,—to Pennsylvania and Ohio, if not still farther. Nor would this have been the only misfortune; such an attempt would, it can scarcely be doubted, have divided the people in many of the free States, and prevented them from giving the government that cordial and united support so indispensable to the Union cause in such a crisis.

The conscientious and anxious desire evinced by the President to respect the constitutional rights of every section of the country, if it produced no favourable influence upon the minds of the Confederates, had at least the effect of gaining over to his cause multitudes of his political opponents in the Northern as well as in the border States; so that tens of thousands who had opposed his election in 1860 became, before the close of his first Presidential term, of the number of his most cordial supporters. He considered it, indeed, to be not merely expedient, but to be his imperative duty, to weigh carefully all the circumstances by which he was surrounded. A religious or moral reformer may very properly content himself with merely proclaiming and expounding great truths, and then leave the minds of men to embrace them, as they may be prepared to do so. But he who, being placed at the head of a government, neglects to consider the question whether his measures are practicable, or whether they are or are not adapted to the actual condition and wants of the people, can have no claim to the name of statesman, although he may possibly merit that of a far-seeing reformer or philanthropist.

To some, who were urging him to issue at once a proclamation of emancipation, intimating that they felt assured it was the will of God that he should do so, Lincoln replied, "I hope it will not be irreverent for me to say that, if it is probable that God would reveal his will to others on a point so connected with my duty, it might be supposed he would reveal it directly to me; for, unless I am more deceived in myself than I often am, it is my earnest desire to know the will of Providence in this matter; and if I can learn what it is, I will do it." At another time he said, "There are 50,000 bayonets in the Union army from the border slave States. It would be a serious matter if, in consequence of a proclamation such as you desire, they should go over to the rebels. . . . Every day increases their Union feeling." He diligently sought every opportunity of informing himself respecting the condition of public sentiment, especially in regard to the question of emancipation. A great change in the minds of the people had undoubtedly taken place in this respect, not only in the North, but also in several of the slave States. After mature deliberation, being at length satisfied that the welfare of the country would be promoted by such a measure, and that public sentiment would sustain it, he issued (September 22, 1862) a proclamation of emancipation, in which it was declared that on the first day of January, 1863, "all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom."

After the battle of Chancellorsville the tide of success seemed to turn in favour of the Union cause. This is not the place to go into any detailed account of the movements of the different armies. It may suffice briefly to notice a few of the principal battles which constituted, so to speak, turning-points in the history of the war, and which had an immediate and important influence in bringing it to a close.

On the 3d of July, 1863, the army of the Potomac, under General Meade, defeated the rebel forces, commanded by General Lee, in a great battle (which had lasted three days) near Gettysburg, in Pennsylvania. On the 4th of the same month, General Grant captured Vicksburg, after a long and most obstinate defence on the part of the garrison, and in spite of the strenuous efforts of the Confederate general Joseph E. Johnston to raise the siege. The number of Confederate troops paroled at Vicksburg was about 27,000, of whom only 15,000 were fit for duty. "This," says Mr. Greeley, "was the heaviest single blow ever given to the muscular resources of the rebellion; and no other campaign in the war equals in brilliancy of conception and general success in execution that which resulted in the capitulation of Vicksburg." As Commander Farragut, supported by a land-army under General Butler, had already (April, 1862) taken possession of New Orleans, the conquest of Vicksburg gave to the Unionists the command of the Mississippi throughout its entire length.

The courage, skill, and, above all, the unconquerable energy displayed by General Grant in the siege and capture of Vicksburg, seemed to point him out to the government as pre-eminently qualified to conduct a war in which a wise foresight, an untiring vigilance, and an indefatigable activity were equally necessary to success. There was another point also wherein, to adopt the language of Mr. Greeley, "his fitness for the chief command was decided, if not pre-eminent; and that was an utter disbelief in the efficacy of any rose-water treatment of the rebellion." On the 1st of March, 1864, in compliance with a recommendation of Congress, the President appointed General Grant lieutenant-general of the armies of the United States. When he presented General Grant with his commission, Mr. Lincoln addressed him with these words: "The nation's appreciation of what you have already done, and its reliance upon you for what still remains to be done, in the existing great struggle, are now presented with this commission, constituting you lieutenant-general of the armies of the United States. With this high honour devolves upon you also a corresponding responsibility. As the country herein trusts you, so, under God, it will sustain you. I scarcely need to add that with what I here speak for the nation, goes my own hearty personal concurrence."

In the autumn of 1864, Mr. Lincoln was a second time elected President of the United States, General McClellan being the opposing candidate. Lincoln received the votes of all the Northern States except New Jersey and Delaware.

General Grant, having taken immediate command of the army of the Potomac, commenced early in May the ever-memorable campaign of 1864 against Richmond. After many severe and bloody conflicts, and the display of consummate military skill on the part of the rival commanders, and an obstinate bravery on the part of their troops, rarely paralleled in the history of warfare, General Lee was at length (April 2, 1865) forced to abandon the defence of Richmond, which was evacuated the following night, and on the 9th of April he surrendered to General Grant with all his army. On the 17th of the same month, General J. E. Johnston, commander of the southern division of the Confederate army, then in North Carolina, entered into terms of capitulation with General Sherman, according to which all the Confederate troops still remaining in the field were to lay down their arms and return to their respective States. Thus the war of the rebellion was brought to a close. But, before the final arrangement between Sherman and Johnston was completed, the universal joy of the Northern States was changed into bitter mourning by the death of President Lincoln, who was cut off in the very hour of triumph by the hand of an assassin. A desperate band of conspirators, of whom John Wilkes Booth, a native of Maryland, was the ringleader, had for some time entertained the design of seizing the President and making him a prisoner. Finding no opportunity to carry their purpose into effect, they resolved at length to take his life. The great object of Lincoln's administration—the restoration of the authority of the government—having been at last accomplished, on the evening of the 14th of April he sought at Ford's Theatre a brief relaxation from the duties and cares of his high office. Booth, being an actor by profession, had free admittance to the theatre. While the President's attention was absorbed by the scene before him, the assassin approached him from behind, unperceived. To make sure of his victim, Booth discharged his pistol when the muzzle was not more than a few inches from the head of the President, who, as the ball entered his brain, sank slightly forward without uttering a sound; and, although he continued to breathe for several hours, he was evidently wholly unconscious from the time that he received the fatal wound until his death, which occurred at half-past seven on the morning of the 15th. Mr. Lincoln had often received anonymous letters threatening him with death; but his thoughts were too much occupied with the affairs of the nation to permit him to feel anxiety for his personal safety; and, indeed, it was impossible for him, as he intimated to some of his friends who urged him to be more on his guard, to render his life secure without adopting precautions alike repugnant to his own feelings and to the universal usage of his country. We believe it is no exaggeration to say that, since the dawn of history, no more upright or conscientious ruler than Abraham Lincoln ever presided over the destinies of a great nation; nor has there been any more free from every taint of selfish ambition or personal resentment.

Among the many eminent men who, in their writings or public speeches, have attempted to portray the character and commemorate the virtues of President Lincoln, we know of none who has been more successful than Mr. Emerson. The admirable fitness of his remarks must be our apology, if any be needed, for giving the following extracts from his discourse delivered at the funeral services held in Concord, Massachusetts, April 19, 1865:

"A plain man of the people, an extraordinary fortune attended him. Lord Bacon says, 'Manifest virtues procure reputation; occult ones, fortune.' He offered no shining qualities at the first encounter; he did not offend by superiority. He had a face and manner which disarmed suspicion, which inspired confidence, which confirmed good will. He was a man without vices. He had a strong sense of duty, which it was very easy for him to obey. Then he had what farmers call a 'long head;' was excellent in working out the sum for himself,—in arguing his case and convincing you fairly and firmly. . . . He had a vast good nature, which made him tolerant and accessible to all. . . . Then his broad good humour, running easily into jocular talk, in which he delighted and in which he excelled, was a rich gift to this wise man. It enabled him to keep his secret, to meet every kind of man, and every rank in society, . . . to mask his own purpose and sound his companion, and to catch with true instinct the temper of every company he addressed. His occupying the chair of state was a triumph of the good sense of mankind and of the public conscience. This middle-class country had got a middle-class President at last. Yes, in manners and sympathies, but not in powers; for his powers were superior. This man grew according to the need; his mind mastered the problem of the day; and as the problem grew, so did his comprehension of it. Rarely was a man so fitted to the event. . . . It cannot be said that there is any exaggeration of his worth. If ever a man was fairly tested, he was. There was no lack of resistance, nor of slander, nor of ridicule. . . . Then what an occasion was the whirlwind of the war! Here was place for no holiday magistrate, no fair-weather sailor: the new pilot was hurried to the helm in a tornado. In four years—four years of battle-days—his endurance, his fertility of resources, his magnanimity, were sorely tried and never found wanting. There, by his courage, his justice, his even temper, his fertile counsel, his humanity, he stood a heroic figure in the centre of a heroic epoch. He is the true history of the American people in his time—the true representative of this continent—father of his country, the pulse of twenty millions throbbing in his heart, the thought of their minds articulated by his tongue."

Lincoln, (BENJAMIN,) an American general, born in Hingham, Massachusetts, in January, 1733. He was originally a farmer. In 1776 he was appointed a major-general of militia, and joined the army of Washington with reinforcements in February, 1777. In this year he was appointed major-general by Congress, and was ordered to join the Northern army, commanded by General Gates. In October, 1777, he received a wound which disabled him for nearly a year. He was appointed to the chief command of the Southern department about September, 1778, and defended Charleston against General Prevost in the spring of 1779. In October of that year General Lincoln and Count D'Estaing made an unsuccessful assault on Savannah. He was besieged by Sir Henry Clinton in Charleston, which he was compelled to surrender in May, 1780. He afterwards commanded a division at the siege of Yorktown, in October 1781. He had the reputation of an able and prudent general. In October, 1781, he became secretary of war. He retired from this office about the end of 1784, and was elected Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts in 1787 by the Federalists. Died at Hingham in 1810.

Lincoln, link'ǫn, (EDWARD CLINTON,) EARL OF, an English admiral, born in 1512, was the only son of Thomas Lord Clinton. He was appointed lord admiral for life in 1550. In 1557 he commanded a division of the English army at Saint-Quentin. On the accession of Elizabeth (1558) he was retained in the office of lord admiral. In the peaceful reign that followed he had little opportunity to acquire renown. He was created Earl of Lincoln in 1572. Died in 1584, leaving the title to his son Henry. A Henry Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, married the daughter of Henry Pelham, who was prime minister about 1750. In 1768 he inherited the title of Duke of Newcastle. Died in 1794.

Lincoln, (JOHN LARKIN,) LL.D., an American scholar and critical writer, born at Boston in 1817. He was appointed in 1844 professor of the Latin language and literature in Brown University. He edited Horace, Livy, and Ovid for the use of schools. Died Oct. 17, 1891.

Lincoln, (LEVI,) an American jurist and statesman, born in Hingham, Massachusetts, in 1749, graduated at Harvard College. He practised law at Worcester, and became one of the most eminent lawyers in the State. In 1799 he was elected a member of Congress. He was a Democrat or Republican in party politics, and was attorney-general under Jefferson from 1801 to December, 1805. In 1807–08 he was Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts. Died at Worcester in 1820.

Lincoln, (LEVI,) a lawyer, a son of the preceding, was born at Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1782. He was chosen Governor of his native State in 1825, being supported by both parties, and was a member of Congress during three terms, (1835–41.) Died in 1868.

Lincoln, (ROBERT TODD,) an American statesman, son of Abraham Lincoln, was born at Springfield, Illinois, August 1, 1843. He graduated at Harvard in 1864, served as a captain through the final campaign of the civil war, and was subsequently engaged in law practice at Chicago. In 1881 he was appointed secretary of war by President Garfield, retaining this post under President Arthur. In 1889 he was appointed minister of the United States to Great Britain. He resumed the practice of his profession in 1893. After the death of George M. Pullman he became acting president of the Pullman Palace Car Company.

Lind, (JAMES,) an English physician, born about 1716, published a valuable "Treatise on the Scurvy," (1753,) and "Essay on the Diseases to which Europeans are exposed in Hot Climates," (1768,) which were often reprinted. Died at Gosport in 1794.

Lind, (JENNY,) a celebrated Swedish vocalist, born at Stockholm in 1820, was the daughter of a teacher of languages. She began to sing on the stage about the age of ten years, and performed in vaudevilles with success. At the age of sixteen she became the prime favourite of the Stockholm Opera, where she made her début as Agatha in "Der Freischütz." In 1841 she became a pupil of Garcia, the celebrated singing-master in Paris, where she met Meyerbeer, who engaged her for the Opera of Berlin. She sang in Berlin in 1844 and 1845, exciting great and unabated enthusiasm. After performing in several capitals of Germany, she visited London, where she was greeted with the warmest applause, in 1847 and the two ensuing years. Having made an engagement with P. T. Barnum to sing in the United States, she arrived at New York in September, 1850. Her concerts in this country excited enthusiastic admiration, and were repeated in the chief cities of the Union until 1852, when she returned to Europe with Otto Goldschmidt, a skilful pianist, to whom she had been married in 1851. In private life she ever maintained an enviable reputation, and while in the United States gave many thousand dollars for charitable purposes. After her marriage she occasionally appeared in charitable concerts. Died November 2, 1887.

Linde, von, fon lin'dĕh, (JUSTIN TIMOTHEUS BALTHASAR,) a German jurist, born in Westphalia in 1797, published numerous legal treatises. Died in 1870.

Linde, von, fon lin'dĕh, (SAMUEL GOTTLOB,) an eminent Polish lexicographer, born at Thorn in 1771. About 1803 he became rector of the Lyceum and chief librarian of the University in Warsaw. In 1807 he produced the first volume of his great "Dictionary of the Polish Language," (6 vols.,) regarded as the best work of the kind. From 1833 to 1838 he was director of the gymnasium of Warsaw. He wrote a "Historical Outline of the Literature of the Slavonic Races," (1825.) Died at Warsaw in 1847.

See SAINT-MAURICE CABANY, "S. T. de Linde," etc., 1853.

Lindeblad, lin'dẹh-blȧd', (ASSAR,) a Swedish poet, born near Lund in 1800. Among his best productions is "The Missionary," (1839.) Died March 3, 1848.

Linden, van der, vȧn dẹr lin'dẹn, (DAVID,) a Flemish poet and antiquary, born at Ghent about 1570; died about 1635.

Linden, van der, vȧn dẹr lin'dẹn, (JAN ANTONIDES.) a learned Dutch physician, born at Enkhuysen in 1609. He became professor of medicine at Leyden about 1650. He published a "Medical Bibliography," ("De Scriptis Medicis," 1637,) "Physiological Medicine," ("Medicina Physiologica,") and a good edition of Hippocrates, in Greek. Died in 1664.

See BAYLE, "Historical and Critical Dictionary:" NICÉRON, "Mémoires."

Lindenau, von, fon lin'dẹh-nŏw', (BERNHARD AUGUST,) a German astronomer, born at Altenburg in 1780. Between 1826 and 1843 he served the King of Saxony as privy councillor, minister of the interior, etc. In 1843 he retired from political life to devote himself to astronomy. Among his publications are "Tables of Venus," (1810,) "Tables of Mars," (1811,) and a "History of Astronomy during the First Decade of the Nineteenth Century," (1811.) Died in 1854.

See BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon."

Lindenbrog, lin'dẹn-brŏg', or Lindenbruch, lin'-dẹn-brŏŏk', [Lat. TILIOBRO'GA,] (ERPOLD,) a German historical writer, born at Bremen in 1540. He wrote a "History of the Kings of Denmark," and "Chronicle of the Life and Actions of Charlemagne." He also edited the "Historians of Northern Germany." Died in 1616.

See WILKENS, "Leben der beruhmten Lindenbrogiorum," 1723.

Lindenschmit, lin'dẹn-shmit', (WILHELM,) a German historical painter, born at Mentz in 1806. Among his works are frescos painted for Prince Ludwig in the Hofgarten, Munich, and in the Pinakothek. Died in 1848.

Lindet, lăn'dȧ', (JEAN BAPTISTE ROBERT,) a French Jacobin and financier, born at Bernay, Normandy, in 1743. He was elected to the Convention in 1792, and was a member of the committee of public safety after its number was reduced and after it was invested with supreme executive power, (1793.) He was reputed one of the least violent but most subtle chiefs of the dominant faction. He was minister of finances from June, 1799, until Bonaparte became First Consul, in November of that year. Died in 1825.

Lĭnd'ley, (JOHN,) LL.D., F.R.S., one of the most eminent botanists of the present century, was born at Catton, near Norwich, England, in 1799. He was the son of the proprietor of a nursery-garden. About 1821 he became a resident of London, and was employed to write the descriptions of Loudon's "Encyclopædia of Plants," (1829.) In 1830 he published an "Introduction to the Natural System of Botany." Of this system he is a zealous advocate, and has contributed more than any other English botanist to render it popular. His "Introduction to Systematic and Physiological Botany" (1832) is highly commended. In 1836 he produced "A Natural System of Botany," which was expanded into "The Vegetable Kingdom," (1846,) with engravings,—probably the most excellent and comprehensive work that has ever appeared on that subject. He adopted in this work an improved, or at least new, system of classification, and explained the uses of plants. In 1829 Dr. Lindley became professor of botany in the University College, London, where he was very successful as a lecturer. His "Flora Medica" (1838) describes the plants used in medical practice. He wrote many botanical articles for the "Penny Cyclopædia," and a good elementary work on Botany inserted in the "Library of Useful Knowledge." In his excellent work entitled "Theory of Horticulture," (1844,) he successfully applied science to practical utility. He was also the author of popular treatises, entitled "Ladies' Botany," "School Botany," "British Pomology," and "Orchard and Kitchen Garden." About 1841 he became editor of the "Gardener's Chronicle," a valuable periodical. Died at Acton Green, November 1, 1865.

Lindner, lĭnt'nẹr, (FRIEDRICH LUDWIG,) a German political writer, born at Mitau, Courland, in 1772. In 1824 he published "Secret Papers," and in 1825 became editor of the "Political Annals," at Munich. He also wrote "Europe and the Orient," (1839,) and other works. Died in 1845.

Lindner, (FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) a German teacher and theologian, born at Weida in 1779. He became professor of the science of teaching at Leipsic in 1825. He published a Latin treatise on the art of teaching, "De Finibus et Præsidiis Artis pædagogicæ," (1825,) and a work on free-masonry. Died in 1864.

Lindner, (WILHELM BRUNO,) a writer on theology, a son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic in 1814. He was appointed professor of theology at Leipsic in 1846. His principal work is a "Manual of the History of the Christian Church," (2 vols., 1848–54.)

Lindpaintner, lĭnt'pīnt'nẹr, (PETER JOSEPH,) a German composer, born at Coblentz in 1791. He produced symphonies, overtures, instrument pieces, and operas entitled "The Sicilian Vespers" and "The Vampyre." Died in 1856.

Lindsay, lin'ze, (ALEXANDER WILLIAM CRAWFORD,) LORD, a British author, the son of the Earl of Crawford, was born in Cumberland in 1812. After making a tour in the East, he published in 1838 "Letters on Egypt, Edom, and the Holy Land," which passed through several editions. He increased his reputation by an important and novel work, entitled "Sketches of the History of Christian Art," (1847,) which displays much research and contains eloquent passages. In 1849 he published the "Lives of the Lindsays," a family history of much merit. Died in 1880.

Lindsay, (Sir DAVID,) a Scottish poet, born about 1495. He became in 1512 a page or servitor to the prince, (afterwards James V.,) and continued in his service until 1524. Among his principal works are "The Dream," "The Complaint of the King's Papingo," (a satire on the clergy,) a "Satire on the Three Estates," and "The Monarchie." He excelled in sarcasm, which he directed with much effect against the Romish Church. He is supposed to have died after 1567.

Lindsay, (DAVID,) an Australian explorer, was born in South Australia in 1856. He entered the government service as a surveyor, and in 1883 became the leader of the Arnheims Land-Exploring Expedition, which endured severe hardships. In 1885–86 he conducted an exploration at his own expense, traversing Australia from south to north through an almost rainless country. He became a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society of London, which published the journals of his explorations.

Lindsay, (JOHN,) Earl of Crawford, an able British general, born in 1702. For his conduct at Fontenoy he obtained the rank of major-general. He was renowned for generosity, talents, and other popular qualities. Died in 1749.

Lindsay, (WILLIAM SCHAW,) a British merchant, born in Ayrshire in 1816, became one of the largest ship-owners in the kingdom. He was once a cabin-boy, and raised himself to affluence by industry and prudence. He published a valuable "History of Merchant Shipping," in 4 vols. He was elected to Parliament in 1854. Died August 28, 1877.

Lindsey, EARL OF. See BERTIE, (ROBERT.)

Lindsey, lin'ze, (MONTAGUE BERTIE,) EARL OF, born in 1608, was a son of Robert Bertie. (See BERTIE.) He fought for Charles I. at Edgehill and Naseby, and, when the king was imprisoned in the Isle of Wight, negotiated the treaty of Newport. Died in 1666.

Lindsey, (THEOPHILUS,) an English Unitarian minister, born in Cheshire in 1723. Having taken orders in the Anglican Church, he obtained in 1763 the living of Catterick, Yorkshire. He became so dissatisfied with the Trinitarian creed that in 1773 he resigned his living and published an "Apology" for his course, which is a work of much research. He then removed to London, where he was successful in forming a Unitarian congregation, and preached about twenty years. He published, besides other works, a "Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship," (1783.) Died in 1808.

See THOMAS BELSHAM, "Memoirs of Theophilus Lindsey," 1812.

Lindsley, lĭnz'le, (PHILIP,) D.D., an American divine and scholar, born at Morristown, New Jersey, in 1786. He became in 1850 professor of ecclesiastical archæology in the New Albany Theological Seminary, Indiana. Died in 1855.

Ling, (PEHR HENRIK,) born in Småland, in Sweden, in 1776, is regarded as one of the founders of modern gymnastics. He founded a gymnastic institute, and introduced "the movement cure" for diseases. He published some volumes of poetry. Died in 1839.

Lĭngă, lĭng'ga, or Lingam, lĭng'gam, in the Hindoo mythology, a phallic symbol, or type of the reproductive power, which is regarded as the especial attribute of Siva. (See SIVA.)

Lingendes, de, deh lăN'zhŏNd', (CLAUDE,) a French pulpit orator and Jesuit, born at Moulins in 1591; died in 1660.

Lingendes, de, (JEAN,) a French poet, born at Moulins about 1580, composed stanzas, odes, and other verses. Died in 1616.

Lingendes, de, (JEAN,) a relative of the preceding, was born at Moulins in 1595. He became an eminent preacher, and chaplain to Louis XIII. He was made Bishop of Mâcon in 1650. Died in 1665.

Linguet, lăN'gā', (SIMON NICOLAS HENRI,) an eloquent French advocate and polemical writer, born at Rheims in 1736. He pleaded with success at the bar of Paris, but made many enemies by his sarcasms and his impetuous temper. He was confined in the Bastille two years, ending in 1782. He published numerous works, which display learning and talent but are censured as paradoxical. Among them are a "History of the Age of Alexander the Great," (1762,) and "The Fanaticism of Philosophers," (1764.) He fell a victim to the reign of terror in 1794.

See GARDAZ, "Essai sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Linguet," 1808; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lingg, ling, (HERMANN LUDWIG OTTO,) a German poet, born at Lindau, January 22, 1820. He graduated at Munich as doctor of medicine in 1843, and studied later in Berlin and Prague. He published many dramas, and some volumes of verse, including "The Migrations of the Peoples," an epic.

Linière, de, deh le'ne-air', (FRANÇOIS PAYOT,) a French satiric poet, born in Paris in 1628, was a gay votary of pleasure. He composed songs and epigrams with facility. Boileau, in his ninth Satire, mentions Linière as a judicious critic. Died in 1704.

Link or Linck, lĭnk, (HEINRICH FRIEDRICH,) a German naturalist and physician, born at Hildesheim in 1767. He was appointed professor of botany and chemistry at Breslau in 1811, and in 1815 filled the same chair at Berlin. He published numerous works on botany, of which we may name "The Anatomy of Plants," (1807,) and "Elements of Botanical Philosophy," (1824.) Died in 1851.

See VON MARTIUS, "Denkrede auf H. F. Linck," 1851; "Biographie Médicale."

Lin'ley, (THOMAS,) an excellent English musical composer, born at Wells about 1725, was a pupil of Paradies. In his early life he conducted the concerts and oratorios at Bath. He composed the music for Sheridan's "Duenna," which had great success, in 1775. In 1776 he removed to London, and became one of the proprietors of Drury Lane Theatre, in partnership with his son-in-law, R. B. Sheridan, the great orator. Mr. Linley directed the musical department, and composed for it the "Carnival of Venice," "The Camp," etc. Among his admired productions are "Six Elegies," "Twelve Ballads," and a madrigal to these verses of Cowley,

> "Let me, careless and unthoughtful lying,
> Hear the soft winds above me flying."

See BURNEY, "History of Music."

Linley, (THOMAS,) a son of the preceding, was born at Bath about 1756, and inherited his father's musical talent. He studied under the best masters of Italy, and became very intimate with Mozart. He composed several admired airs for the theatre. He was drowned in 1778, while sailing in a pleasure-boat in Lincolnshire.

Linley, (WILLIAM,) a brother of the preceding, was born about 1766. In his youth he went to India as a clerk, and rose to the office of sub-treasurer at Fort Saint George. He returned to England in the prime of life, and devoted himself to music and literature. He composed several glees, songs, and other verses, and published the dramatic songs of Shakspeare. Died in 1835.

Linn, (JOHN BLAIR,) D.D., an American poet and divine, born at Shippensburg, Pennsylvania, in 1777, was brother-in-law of the celebrated novelist Charles Brockden Brown, and son of William Linn, who was also a divine. He became assistant pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia in 1798. He was the author of "The Powers of Genius," and other poems, and a reply to Dr. Priestley's "Comparison between Socrates and Christ." Died in 1804.

See DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature."

Linn, (LEWIS FIELDS,) M.D., a Senator of the United States, was born near Louisville, Kentucky, in 1795, and removed to Missouri about 1816. He was elected to the Senate by the Democrats in 1833, and again about 1838. Died in 1843.

See "Life of L. F. Linn," by E. A. LINN and N. SARGENT, 1857.

Linnæus, lin-nee'us, [Sw. VON LINNÉ, fon lin-nī',] (CHARLES or CARL,) a celebrated Swedish botanist, and the most influential naturalist of the eighteenth century, was born at Råshult, in Småland, on the 24th of May, 1707. He was the son of Nicholas Linnæus, a village curate, who, it is said, so far underrated his son's capacity that he made him an apprentice to a shoemaker after he had reached the age of seventeen without making much progress in his studies. In 1727, however, he was sent to the University of Lund to study medicine, and his inclination for natural history was favoured by Professor Stobæus. Although nearly destitute of pecuniary resources, he pursued his studies at Upsal, (1728,) where he was patronized by Olaus Celsius, who relieved him from his extreme poverty. About 1730 he conceived the idea of a reform in botanical method and nomenclature, and began the composition of several great works, noticed below. At the expense of the Royal Academy of Upsal, he made a botanical excursion on foot through Lapland in 1732, the results of which appeared in his "Flora Lapponica," (1737.)

Between 1735 and 1738 he passed three years in the house of George Cliffort, a rich Dutch gentleman living between Leyden and Haarlem, who employed him to arrange his fine garden and museum. Linnæus has expressed his gratitude to this benefactor for the facilities he there enjoyed for his favourite pursuits, and has honoured his memory by a work entitled "The Garden of Cliffort," ("Hortus Cliffortianus.") He perceived that it was necessary to invent methods of distribution capable of embracing all creatures, and founded on characters well defined; to invent terms sufficiently numerous to designate the prodigious variety of their conformation, and define these terms with precision; finally, to make a general review of all beings described in former works, or to be found by the exploration of nature. The first sketch of this great enterprise appeared in two small volumes, entitled "System of Nature, or the Three Kingdoms of Nature exhibited methodically in Classes, Orders, Genera, and Species," ("Systema Naturæ, seu Regna tria Naturæ systematicè proposita, per Classes, Ordines, Genera et Species," 1735,) and "Fundamenta Botanica," (1736.) The characters of genera were largely developed in his "Genera of Plants according to the Number, Figure, Position, etc. of the Parts of Fructification," ("Genera Plantarum secundum Numerum, Figuram, etc. omnium Fructificationis Partium," 1737.) He removed in 1738 to Stockholm, where he practised medicine, lectured on botany, and received the title of physician to the king. He married a daughter of Dr. More in 1739. In 1741 he obtained at Upsal the chair of botany, which he occupied thirty-seven years, witnessing the continuous growth of his fame and influence, and exerting his unabated activity to improve his scientific productions. Thunberg, Kalm, Hasselquist, Forskål, and other eminent naturalists, who had been his pupils, visited various foreign countries and brought back willing tribute to enrich his collections and publications. The botanical philosophy of Linnæus was reproduced in its ensemble, arranged in its parts, and enforced by examples in his "Philosophia Botanica," (1751.) "This work," says Cuvier, "which exhibits on every page proofs of the rarest ingenuity (finesse d'esprit) and the most surprising profoundness of observation, has enjoyed a success which was previously unexampled. It has become as it were a fundamental law, to which all botanists conform in their descriptions and in their use of terms." His artificial sexual system was for a long time universally adopted, but has been superseded in a great measure by the natural method of Jussieu. In 1753 he produced his "Species Plantarum," an important work, in which he adopted the happy idea of designating each species by a single epithet added to the name of the genus. He also applied his methods with success to the animal kingdom in several enlarged editions of his "Systema Naturæ," in his "Fauna Suecica," ("Swedish Fauna," 1744,) or history of Swedish animals, and various other works. Died in January, 1778.

Linnæus, (Linné,) von, (CHARLES or CARL,) only son of the preceding, was born at Fahlun in 1741. He was chosen demonstrator of botany at the Royal Garden of Upsal at the age of eighteen, and succeeded his father as professor in the university of that place in 1778. He published "Two Decades of Rare Plants of the Garden of Upsal," "Methodus Muscorum," ("Method of Mosses,") and a few other small works. His talents were moderate. He died in 1783, and the family then became extinct.

Lin'nell, (JOHN,) a successful English portrait- and landscape-painter, born in London in 1792. Among his well-known works are "A Heath Scene," "The Windmill," (1847,) "The Eve of the Deluge," (1848,) "The Return of Ulysses," (1849,) "Christ and the Woman of Samaria," (1850,) "The Forest Road," (1853,) "The Last Gleam before the Storm," "The Last Sleep," (1869,) "Sleeping for Sorrow," (1870,) "Shelter," (1871,) "Forward," (1872,) "The Coming Storm," (1873,) "Woods and Forest," (1875,) "Autumn," (1877,) and "The Heath," (1878.) Died January 20, 1882.

Linschooten, van, vän lin'skō'ten, (ADRIAAN,) a skilful Dutch painter of history and genre, born at Delft in 1590. Among his works is "The Repentance of Saint Peter." Died about 1678.

Linschooten or Linschoten, van, (JAN HUGO,) a Dutch voyager, born at Haarlem in 1563. He went to Goa in 1583, and remained there several years in the service of Archbishop Fonseca. After his return, he published in 1596 an "Account of his Voyage, with a Description of the Portuguese East Indies," which is said to be reliable, and has often been reprinted. Died in 1633.

Lins'kell, (MARY,) an English novelist, born at Whitby in 1840. She wrote "Tales from the North Riding," (1871,) "The Haven under the Hill," (1886,) and other works. Died in 1891.

Lint, van, vän lint, (HENDRIK,) a skilful Flemish landscape-painter, lived probably about 1630–50. He worked in Rome, where he obtained the surname of STUDIO. Among his works is "Views near Rome."

Lint, van, (PIETER,) a Flemish painter of history, born at Antwerp in 1609. He worked in Rome, and afterwards at Antwerp, to which he returned in 1639, and was patronized by Christian IV. of Denmark. He was a good colorist, a correct designer, and painted history with equal success in large or small pictures. Died about 1668.

Lin'ton, (ELIZA LYNN,) an English novelist, born at Keswick in 1822. Her maiden name was LYNN. In 1858 she married W. J. Linton, the engraver. Among her works are "Azeth," (1846,) "True History of Joshua Davidson," (1872,) "Patricia Kemball," (1874,) "Ione," (1882,) "The One too Many," (1894,) etc.

Linton, (Sir JAMES DRUMGOLE,) an English painter, born at London in 1840. He became a member of the Institute of Water-Colour Painters in 1867, its president in 1884, and was knighted in 1885. In oil he painted "The Marriage of the Duke of Albany," (1885.)

Lin'ton, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English landscape-painter, born at Liverpool about 1790. He became a resident of London in his youth, and afterwards travelled extensively in the South of Europe. The subjects of his best works are Italian and Grecian scenes, among which are "The Bay of Naples," "Lake Lugano," "Ruins of Pæstum," "Athens," and "An Arcadian Landscape." His style is simple and rather austere. Died in 1876.

Linton, (WILLIAM JAMES,) an eminent wood-engraver and author, born in London, December 7, 1812. He took part (1844–48) in various Chartist and republican movements. He removed in 1867 to the United States. Among his works are a "History of Wood-Engraving," "Works of Deceased British Artists," (1860,) "Claribel, and other Poems," (1865,) "Life of Thomas Paine," "History of Wood-Engraving in America," (1882,) "A Manual of Wood-Engraving," (1884,) "Poems and Translations," (1889,) "The Masters of Wood-Engraving," (1889,) "Life of Whittier," (1893,) and "Memories," (1895.) Died in 1897.

Lī'nus, [Gr. Λίνος,] a fabulous personage, whom the ancients regarded as a son of Apollo or Mercury, and as one of the inventors of poetry. He is called by some authors a personification of the dirge. Among the ancient Greeks circulated a plaintive song or dirge called "Linus," which is mentioned by Homer, ("Iliad," xviii. 569.) According to tradition, he was killed by Hercules, who was his pupil.

Lī'nus, [Fr. LIN, lăn,] Bishop of Rome, was a native of Volterra, in Tuscany. According to some accounts, he became bishop in 66 A.D., and was the immediate successor of Saint Peter. Little is known of his history; but it is supposed that he suffered martyrdom about 78 A.D. He is mentioned in Saint Paul's second Epistle to Timothy, chap. iv. 21.

Lionne, de, deh le'on', (HUGUES,) Marquis de Berny, a French statesman and diplomatist, born at Grenoble in 1611. He was sent as ambassador to Rome in 1655. He succeeded Mazarin in 1661 as minister of foreign affairs, which he directed with great ability for ten years. Died in 1671

Liotard, le'o'tȧr', (JEAN ÉTIENNE,) a Swiss portrait-painter, surnamed THE TURK, because he adopted the Turkish costume, was born at Geneva in 1702. In 1725 he went to Paris, where he acquired reputation by his skill in crayon and enamel miniatures. He worked four years in Constantinople, (1738–42), painting Turkish costumes, etc. He afterwards painted portraits of the royal families of Austria and France. Died in 1790.

See NAGLER, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Liotard, (JEAN MICHEL,) a twin-brother of the preceding, born at Geneva in 1702, was an engraver, and one of the best pupils of Benoît Audran. He engraved the great cartoons of C. Cignani in Italy, and afterwards worked in Paris. He returned to Geneva, where he died about 1760.

Liouville, le'oo'vėl', (JOSEPH,) an able French mathematician, born at Saint-Omer in 1809. He became in 1839 a member of the Institute. He wrote several important treatises, and edited for a long time a journal of pure mathematics called by his name. Died in 1882.

Lippi, lėp'pee, (ANNIBALE,) a Roman architect, who lived in the sixteenth century.

Lippi, (FILIPPO,) one of the most celebrated of the old Italian painters in oil and fresco, born at Florence in 1412, was a pupil of Masaccio. Before he was of age he was captured by pirates and enslaved in Africa. His master was so pleased with a portrait of himself, drawn with a coal on the wall, that he gave the artist his liberty. Lippi then returned to Florence, and adorned the churches and convents of that city, and of Spoleto, Prato, etc. Among his master-pieces are a Madonna, in oil, "The Life of Saint Stephen," "The Death of San Bernardo," in oil, at Prato, two "Annunciations," and "The Coronation of the Virgin," in fresco. He excelled in invention design, and colouring, and is ranked among the greatest painters before Raphael. Died in 1469.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters;" LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie;" TICOZZI, "Dizionario."

Lippi, (FILIPPO or FILIPPINO,) son of the preceding, was born at Florence in 1460, and became an excellent painter. He studied with Sandro Botticelli, and worked chiefly in Florence and Rome. He was distinguished for his good taste and correctness of design, and was perhaps the first painter among the moderns who treated costumes and other accessories with propriety. Among his master-pieces are "Saint Peter and Saint Paul before the Proconsul," the "Death of Lucretia," at the Pitti palace in Florence, several Madonnas, and frescos in Santa Maria Novella, in the same city. Died in 1505.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters;" LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lippi, (GIACOMO,) an Italian painter, born near Bologna in the sixteenth century, was a pupil of L. Caracci.

Lippi, (LIPPO,) called LIPPO OF FLORENCE, a Florentine painter, born in 1354, was the father of Filippo Lippi, (1412–69.) His works, which are praised by Vasari, are not now extant. Died in 1415.

Lippi, (LORENZO,) a successful Italian painter and poet, born at Florence in 1606, received lessons in art from Roselli. He worked in Florence, and was reputed one of the best draughtsmen of his time. "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and "The Triumph of David" are called his master-pieces. He wrote a facetious poem called "Il Malmantile racquistato," (1676,) which was admired and recognized by the Academy della Crusca among the testi di lingua. Died in 1664.

Lip'pin-cott, (JOSHUA B.,) an American publisher, distinguished for his ability, energy, and enterprise, was born in Burlington county, New Jersey, March 18, 1813. About 1828 he came to Philadelphia, and at an early age commenced the publishing and bookselling business, which he conducted successfully. In 1850 he purchased the business of Messrs. Grigg & Elliot, and the firm of which he became the head soon took its place among the most distinguished publishing houses in the United States. Died January 5, 1886.

Lippincott, (SARAH J.,) a popular American writer, whose original name was CLARKE, was born at Pompey, in Onondaga county, New York, about 1825. Her first productions appeared in the New York "Mirror," under the pseudonym of GRACE GREENWOOD. She also contributed to the "National Era," Washington. Her principal works are "Greenwood Leaves," (1850–52,) "Haps and Mishaps of a Tour in Europe," (1852,) "Forest Tragedy, and Other Tales," (1856,) "Records of Five Years," (1867,) "New Life in New Lands," (1873,) and "Life of Queen Victoria," (1883.) She was married in 1853 to Leander K. Lippincott, of Philadelphia, where she became editor of a popular juvenile periodical called "The Little Pilgrim."

Lippman, (GABRIEL,) a French electrician, was born at Hallerich, Luxembourg, in 1845. He invented a highly delicate electrometer and other instruments, and experimented in colour photography. He was professor of mathematical physics at Paris in 1883, and of experimental physics in 1886. His writings are on electrical subjects.

Lippo OF FLORENCE. See LIPPI.

Lippomani, lėp-po-mȧ'nee, (ALOISIO,) a learned Italian prelate, born at Venice about 1500. He obtained successively the bishoprics of Modon, Verona, and Bérgamo, and was one of three prelates selected to preside over the Council of Trent. In 1556 he became secretary to Pope Julius III. He wrote, besides a few other works, commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, and the Psalms. Died in 1559.

Liprandi, le-prȧn'dee, (PAUL PETROVITCH,) a Russian general, born in 1796, distinguished himself at the taking of Warsaw, in 1831, and in the Crimean war took (1854) the Turkish fortress at Kadikoi. Died in 1864.

Lips, lips, (JOHANN HEINRICH,) a Swiss painter, designer, and engraver, born near Zurich in 1758. Among his best works are the engravings for Lavater's "Physiognomical Fragments," and a "Saint Sebastian," after Van Dyck. Died in 1817.

Lipse, (JUSTE.) See LIPSIUS.

Lipsius, lip'se-ûs, (JUSTUS,) [Fr. JUSTE LIPSE, zhüst lèps,] a Flemish scholar, critic, and philologist of high reputation, was born at Isque, between Brussels and Louvain, in 1547. He was educated at Brussels and Louvain. At the age of nineteen he produced "Various Readings," ("Variæ Lectiones,") which were received with favour. He was professor of history in Jena two years, ending in 1574, and occupied the same chair at Leyden from 1579 to 1592. About this time he became a Roman Catholic, and was afterwards professor of history at Louvain. He wrote many works on history, criticism, antiquities, etc., which were very popular in his time. His best work, according to Scaliger, is a commentary on Tacitus, (1574,) whose history, it is said, he knew by heart. His admiration of Tacitus and Seneca spoiled his Latinity, which was affectedly concise. His moral character is said to have been good. Died in 1606.

Lipsius, (RICHARD ADELBERT,) a German theologian, born at Gera in 1830. He studied at Leipzig, and was successively professor at Vienna, Kiel, and Jena. He wrote several theological works, the latest being "Philosophie und Religion," (1885.) Died in 1892.

Liron, le'rôN', (JEAN,) a learned French Benedictine monk, born at Chartres in 1665, lived in Paris and at Mans. Among his works are "The Amenities of Criticism," (2 vols., 1717,) and a curious book called "Historic and Literary Oddities," ("Singularités historiques et littéraires," 4 vols., 1734–40.) Died in 1749.

Liruti, le-roo'tee, (GIOVANNI GIUSEPPE,) an Italian antiquary, born in Friuli about 1710; died in 1780.

Lis, lîs or lèss, (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) a Belgian composer, born at Antwerp in 1784; died in 1845.

Lis or Lys, liss, or Van der Lys, vân der liss, (JAN,) a Dutch painter, born at Oldenburg in 1570. He worked in Rome and Venice, taking for his models Titian and Paul Veronese. Some critics find in his works the good colouring of the former with the grace of the latter. Among his productions are "Adam and Eve Mourning for Abel," and "The Prodigal Son." Died at Venice in 1629.

Lis or Lys, van der, (JAN,) a Dutch painter, born at Breda about 1600. A picture of "Diana Bathing" is called his best work.

Lisboa, de, dâ lès-bo'â, (MARCOS,) a Portuguese historian and Franciscan friar, born at Lisbon in 1511. He wrote a "Chronicle of the Order of Friars of Saint Francis," (3 vols., 1556, 1570, 1660,) and is ranked among the classic authors of Portugal. Died in 1591.

Liscov, lis'kof, (CHRISTIAN LUDWIG,) the most excellent satirist and prose writer of Germany before Lessing, was born at Wittenberg in 1701. He lived at Lubeck, Dresden, etc., and about 1741 became secretary to Bruhl, the Saxon minister. In 1745 he obtained the title of Kriegsrath, (councillor of war,) but a few years later he was removed from office. He published in 1739 a "Collection of Satirical and Serious Writings." His style was remarkable for purity. His works are pervaded by a sound philosophical spirit, and have been more highly appreciated since his death than before. He was a complete master of the weapons of irony. One of his treatises is entitled "The Excellence and Utility of Bad Writers." Died in 1760.

Lisle, de. See DELISLE.

Lisle, de, deh lèl, (JEAN BAPTISTE ISOARD,) a prolific French writer, called also DELISLE DE SALES, was born at Lyons in 1743. He was condemned to exile for the alleged immorality of his "Philosophy of Nature," which consequently attracted attention; but his sentence was annulled or remitted. He wrote many other works. Died in 1816.

Lismanin, lis-mâ-neen', (FRANCIS,) a Socinian theologian, born at Corfù, became confessor to the Queen of Poland about 1546. Died about 1563.

Lisola, de, deh le'zo'lâ', (FRANÇOIS PAUL,) BARON, an able diplomatist, born at Salins, France, in 1613. He was successively employed by the Emperor of Germany as minister to England, (1743,) to Poland, and to Spain. He wrote several successful political treatises, one of which, called "Shield of the State and of Justice," (1667,) was directed against the ambition of Louis XIV. Died about 1675.

List, list, (FRIEDRICH,) a German political economist, was born at Reutlingen in 1789. In 1825 he emigrated to Pennsylvania, where he was extensively engaged in coal-mining, and published, in English, "Outlines of a New System of Political Economy," (Philadelphia, 1827.) Having been appointed United States consul at Leipsic, he returned to Europe in 1832, and in several publications efficiently advocated the construction of railroads in Germany. He published "A National System of Political Economy," (Stuttgart, 1841,) in which he favours the protection of native industry. He committed suicide in 1846. Since his death his merit has been more fully recognized throughout Germany.

Lista y Aragon, lès'tâ e â-râ-gôn', (Don ALBERTO,) an eminent Spanish poet, critic, and mathematician, born at Triana, a suburb of Seville, in 1775. At the age of twenty he became professor of mathematics in the nautical college of Seville. He obtained the chair of rhetoric and poetry in the university of that city in 1807, but lost it in consequence of the French invasion of 1808. He passed about four years as an exile in France, from 1813 to 1817. In 1820 he began to edit "The Censor," at Madrid. After various removals and adverse fortunes, he became about 1833 editor of the "Gaceta de Madrid," which in his hands was an able and successful political journal. In 1822 he published a volume of poems, which are greatly admired. His superior critical ability is displayed in his "Lectures on the Dramatic Literature of Spain," (1839.) He also published a "Treatise on Pure and Mixed Mathematics," which is a standard work. As a lyric poet he united the fervour and splendid colour of the old Spanish school with the purer taste and depth of reflection of the moderns. His imitations of Horace, in his "Philosophic Poems," are admirable. Died in 1848.

Lis'ter, (JOSEPH,) LORD, an eminent English physician, was born at Upton, Essex, April 5, 1827. He graduated in medicine at London University in 1852, and was successively lecturer on surgery at Edinburgh, and professor at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and King's College Hospital, London. His great achievement was the introduction, in 1860 and after, of the antiseptic system of treatment known as Listerism, which has revolutionized surgery. He received numerous honours, was president of the British Association in 1896, and was made a baronet in 1883 and a peer in 1897.

Lister, (JOSEPH JACKSON,) father of the preceding, attained distinction by his improvement of the microscope, producing about 1828 a perfectly achromatic combination of lenses, thus overcoming what had been the chief defect in the microscope.

Lister, (MARTIN,) M.D., F.R.S., an English naturalist, born at Radcliffe (Bucks) about 1638. In 1670 he settled at York, where he practised medicine. He removed to London in 1684, and published "Synopsis Conchyliorum," (1685–93,) a valuable work on conchology, which was highly commended by Linnæus. In 1709 he became physician to Queen Anne. He wrote three excellent treatises on English Spiders, Fluviatile Shells, and Marine Shells, (1678,) and other works. "Lister may be reckoned," says Hallam, "one of those who have done most to found the science of conchology." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1711.

See THOMPSON, "History of the Royal Society."

Lister, (Sir MATTHEW,) an English physician, born in Yorkshire about 1565. He became president of the College of Physicians, London, and physician to Charles I. Died in 1657.

Lister, (THOMAS HENRY,) an English author and gentleman, born about 1800, was the son of Thomas Lister, Esq., of Armitage Park. He obtained the office of registrar-general of births. He published two novels entitled "Granby," (1826,) and "Herbert Lacy," and a "Life of Lord Clarendon the Historian." He married the sister of the Earl of Clarendon, known as the authoress of "Sketches of the Contemporaries of Lord Chancellor Clarendon." Died in 1842. In 1844 his widow became the wife of Sir George Cornewall Lewis. He was a brother-in-law of Lord John Russell.

Lis'ton, (JOHN,) a popular English comedian, born in London in 1756, appeared on the London stage about 1805. He excelled in low comedy, and acted many years at the Haymarket, Covent Garden, and Drury Lane Theatres. Died in 1846.

Lis'ton, (ROBERT,) F.R.S., an eminent Scottish physician, born in 1794. About 1817 he began to practise in Edinburgh, where he attained great eminence as a surgeon. In 1833 he published his "Principles of Surgery." He removed to London in 1834, practised with success, and became professor of clinical surgery in University College. Died in 1848.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement.)

Liszinski, le-shĕn'skee, (CASIMIR,) a Polish philosopher, who was beheaded in 1689 on a false charge of heresy or atheism.

Liszt, list, (FRANZ,) a Hungarian musician, and the most celebrated pianist of recent times, was born at Raiding in 1811. He was instructed by Czerny and Salieri at Vienna, and afterwards repaired to Paris, where his performance made a great sensation. About 1823 he visited England, and was received with equal enthusiasm. Having, after his return to Paris, heard Paganini, he resolved to obtain the same mastery over the piano which that great musician had gained over the violin; and it is generally allowed that he succeeded. He visited the principal cities of Europe, and everywhere excited the warmest admiration. Though he produced many compositions, he chiefly excelled as a performer. Liszt was distinguished for generosity, and gave largely to charitable and useful institutions. In 1848 he was appointed leader of the orchestra in the imperial chapel at Weimar. In 1865 he became a cleric of the Roman Catholic Church. Liszt had several natural children, one of whom (Cosima, whose mother was the Countess d'Agoult) was married first to Von Bülow and then to Richard Wagner. Another daughter married Émile Ollivier. He was the author of a "Life of Frederick Chopin." Died July 31, 1886.

Lith'gōw, (WILLIAM,) a traveller, who traversed on foot a large part of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and published in 1614 an entertaining narrative of his travels. At Malaga he was arrested as a spy and heretic, and tortured by the Inquisition.

Lithov, lit'hov, ? (GUSTAVUS,) a Latin poet, born in Sweden in 1692. In 1734 he published "Heroic-Miscellaneous Poems," ("Poëmata heroico-miscellanea.") His "Panegyric on Charles XII." (1720) produced a great sensation. Died in 1753.

Lit'olff, (HENRY CHARLES,) an English pianist and composer, born in London, February 6, 1818. His father, an Alsatian, had settled in London as a violinist. He gave concerts in the principal European cities, and, after many wanderings, finally settled in Paris. Died in 1891.

Litta, lĕt'tȧ, (POMPEO,) COUNT, an Italian historical writer, born in Milan in 1781. He entered the French army in 1804, fought at Austerlitz, (1805,) and, having obtained the grade of chef-de-bataillon, left the service in 1814. In 1819 he began to publish at Milan his famous and costly work, "Celebrated Italian Families," which was continued until his death, and contains accounts of seventy-five families. It is considered remarkable for historical accuracy. Died in 1852.

Lit'tle, (JAMES STANLEY,) a British art writer, born at Herne Hill. He was secretary of the Society of Authors 1888–90, and edited the "African Review," 1895–97. He published a number of works on political, art, and other subjects.

Lit'tle, (WILLIAM,) an English historian, called NAUBRIGENSIS, was born at Bridlington, Yorkshire, in 1136. He became a monk of Newborough Abbey, and wrote a "History of England from the Conquest to 1197," which is a work of merit.

Little, (W. J. KNOX.) See KNOX-LITTLE.

Lit'tle-dāle, (RICHARD FREDERICK,) LL.D., a British clergyman, born at Dublin, September 14, 1833. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1854, and in 1856 took orders in the English Church. He published a large number of works, controversial, liturgical, and other. He was of the extreme High-Church party, but was a zealous anti-Romanist. Died January 11, 1890.

Lit'tle-jŏhn, (ABRAM NEWKIRK,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Florida, New York, December 13, 1824, graduated at Union College in 1845, took orders in the Episcopal Church, 1848, 1849, and was consecrated Bishop of Long Island (the first of that title) in 1869. He has made large and important contributions to current religious literature.

Lit'tle-ton, (ADAM,) an English divine, eminent as a philologist and Orientalist, was born in Shropshire in 1627. He became chaplain to Charles II., rector of Chelsea, and prebendary of Westminster. His Latin Dictionary (1679) was esteemed and often reprinted. He published many sermons, and other works. Died in 1694.

Littleton, (EDWARD,) LORD, lord keeper of the great seal of England, born at Munslow, Shropshire, in 1589, was a lineal descendant of the jurist Thomas Littleton. After finishing his studies in the Inner Temple, he soon rose to the summit of his profession. In 1626 he entered Parliament, where he was at first a zealous adherent of the popular party, but afterwards went over to the court with Wentwortn and others. He was made chief justice of the common pleas in 1640, and reluctantly accepted the great seal in January, 1641. He was then raised to the peerage, as Lord Littleton. The vacillation which he displayed in the contest between Charles I. and the Parliament is ascribed to lack of moral courage; but he was suspected of perfidy by the royalists and by the king. In 1642 the king, then at York, ordered Falkland to demand the great seal from the "traitor." Littleton soon joined the court at York, and, through the intercession of Lord Clarendon, was retained in office until his death, in 1645. "He was," says Lord Campbell, "a man of excellent private character."

See LORD CAMPBELL, "Lives of the Lord Chancellors of England," 1846; FOSS, "The Judges of England."

Littleton, (EDWARD,) an English poet. He was presented to the living of Maple Durham about 1727, and was afterwards chaplain to the king. He was author of Verses on a Spider, and other poems. Died in 1734.

Littleton, LORD. See LYTTLETON.

Littleton or Lyttleton, (THOMAS,) a celebrated English judge and jurist, born probably about 1420, was the son of Thomas Westcote, of Devonshire, and Elizabeth Littleton. He studied in the Inner Temple. In 1455 he was appointed king's serjeant, and rode the northern circuit as judge of assize. After the triumph of the house of York, he received a pardon from Edward IV., about 1462, and was retained in the office of king's sergeant. He was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas in 1466, and created a knight of the Bath in 1475. He died in 1481, leaving three sons, from whom the lord keeper Lyttleton and other eminent men descended. His treatise on "Tenures," written in Norman French, is regarded as the principal basis of the laws of property in Great Britain. Sir Edward Coke wrote a celebrated commentary on Littleton.

Littré, le'trȧ', (MAXIMILIEN PAUL ÉMILE,) a French philologist, born in Paris in 1801. He was an editor of the "National," a democratic journal, from 1831 to 1851 and published a translation of Hippocrates, (8 vols.

1839–52,) a translation of Strauss's "Life of Jesus," (1839–40,) "History of the French Language," (1862,) an admirable "Dictionary of the French Language," (1863–73,) "Medicines and Medical Men," (1873,) etc. In 1867 he established a new review, "La Philosophie Positive." In 1871 he became professor of history and geography in the Polytechnic School, and was elected a member of the French Academy. Died June 2, 1881.

Littrow, lit'trof or lit'tro, (JOSEPH JOHANN,) an eminent astronomer, born in Bohemia in 1781. He was appointed professor of astronomy at Cracow in 1807, and at Kazan in 1810. In 1819 he became director of the Observatory of Vienna, which he greatly improved, and lectured on astronomy with success in that city. He published many valuable scientific works, among which are "Theoretic and Practical Astronomy," (1822–25,) "Dioptrics," (1830,) and "The Wonders of the Heavens," (1853.) The last is called one of the best popular books on that subject. Died in 1840.

Littrow, (KARL LUDWIG,) a son of the preceding, was born at Kazan in 1811. He succeeded his father as director of the Observatory of Vienna in 1842. The Annals of this observatory which have appeared since his appointment are esteemed among the most valuable astronomical registers. In 1847 Littrow and W. Struve were employed to connect Austria and Russia by triangulation. Littrow died at Vienna, November 16, 1877.

Lit-ȳ-er'sēē, [Gr. Αιτνέρσης,] a son of Midas, King of Phrygia, was killed by Hercules.

Liv'ẹr-more, (ABIEL ABBOTT,) an American Unitarian divine, born at Wilton, New Hampshire, in 1811, became in 1850 pastor of a church at Cincinnati, and from 1863 to 1890 was president of Meadville, Pa., Theological School. He published several commentaries and other works in prose and verse. Died Nov. 28, 1892.

Livermore, (MARY ASHTON,) an American writer, born at Boston, Massachusetts, December 19, 1821. Her maiden name was RICE. Her husband was D. P. Livermore, a Universalist preacher. During the war of 1861–65 she was very prominent in the work of sanitary relief, both in the field and in the Northern cities. After the war she edited the "Woman's Journal," and became distinguished as a public speaker. She has been active in the temperance and woman suffrage movements, and has published several works, including "American Women" (with Frances E. Willard.)

Liv'ẹr-pool, (CHARLES JENKINSON,) first EARL OF, a British statesman, born in Oxfordshire in 1727, was the son of Charles Jenkinson. In 1761 he entered Parliament, and was appointed by Lord Bute under-secretary of state. After the retirement of Lord Bute, in 1763, he acquired the favour of the king, and incurred much popular odium as the chief of the secret cabinet. He became one of the lords of the treasury in 1767, was secretary of war under Lord North from 1778 to 1782, and was afterwards president of the board of trade in the ministry of the younger Pitt. He was created Lord Hawkesbury in 1786, and Earl of Liverpool in 1796. In 1758 he had published a "Discourse on the Conduct of Great Britain with respect to Neutral Nations." He died in 1808, leaving his title to his son, who became premier.

Liverpool, (ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON,) EARL OF, a conservative British statesman, eminent for his prudence and prosperity, born in 1770, was the son of the preceding. He was educated at Oxford. In 1790 he entered Parliament as a political friend of Pitt. He distinguished himself by his candour in debate, by abilities more solid than brilliant, and by his persistent hostility to innovation or reform. About 1796 he received the title of Lord Hawkesbury, and married a daughter of the Earl of Bristol. He became foreign secretary in the ministry of Addington in March, 1801, and made peace with Napoleon by the treaty of Amiens in 1802. In 1804 he accepted the office of home secretary under Pitt, who had returned to power. The ministry having been dissolved by the death of Pitt, in 1806, Lord Hawkesbury was requested by the king to form a new ministry; but he declined the task. He took office as home secretary in the cabinet of the Duke of Portland in 1807, and succeeded to his father's earldom in 1808. In June, 1812, he obtained the place of first lord of the treasury, or premier, vacated by the death of Percival, which he retained until he was prostrated by a stroke of apoplexy in February, 1827. "He presided over the councils of England," says Brougham, "for a longer time than any other, excepting Walpole and Pitt. It happened to him that the years during which the helm of the state, as it is called, were intrusted to his hands, were those of the greatest events, alike in negotiation, in war, in commerce, and in finance, which ever happened to illustrate or to checker the annals of Europe. . . . So long and so little interrupted a course of official prosperity was never, perhaps, enjoyed by any other statesman." Brougham also represents him as remarkable for discretion and as a model of safe mediocrity. He is censured for opposing the abolition of the slave-trade, and for the part he took in the persecution of Queen Caroline. Died in December, 1828.

Liv'ĭ-ạ, [Fr. LIVIE, le've',] or, more fully, Liv'ĭ-ạ Dru-sil'lạ, a Roman empress, born in 58 B.C., was first married to Tiberius Nero. After becoming the mother of Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus, she was married in 38 B.C. to the emperor Augustus, over whom she acquired an ascendency which she retained until his death. She persuaded him to adopt her son Tiberius as his successor. By his last will he appointed Livia and Tiberius his heirs, and directed her to assume the name of Julia Augusta. She was a woman of superior talents. Died in 29 A.D.

See J. D. KOEHLER, "Dissertatio de Livia Augusta," 1715; TACITUS, "Annales," i. and v.; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Liv'ĭ-ạ Liv-il'lạ, a granddaughter of the preceding, was the sister of Germanicus. She became the wife of her cousin Drusus, the son of Tiberius, and was suspected of poisoning her husband in concert with Sejanus. She was put to death for that crime, by order of Tiberius, about 30 A.D.

Liv'ing-ston, (BROCKHOLST,) an American jurist and soldier, born in New York in 1764, served with distinction in the Revolutionary war, and subsequently rose to be a judge of the supreme court of the United States. He was a son of William Livingston, Governor of New Jersey. Died in 1823.

Livingston, (EDWARD,) an eminent American jurist and statesman, born in Clermont, Columbia county, New York, on the 26th of May, 1764, was a son of Robert Livingston, a judge of the supreme court of New York. His mother was Margaret Beekman. He graduated at Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1781, studied law, and began to practise in the city of New York about 1785. He married Mary McEvers, of New York. After he had acquired great eminence as an advocate, he was elected a member of Congress in 1794 by the Democrats. He was re-elected in 1796 and in 1798. In 1801 he was appointed district-attorney of the United States for the State of New York, and elected mayor of the city of New York for two years. In the autumn of 1803 he became a public defaulter in consequence of the misconduct of one of his clerks. He made an assignment of his property, resigned his offices, and removed in 1804 to New Orleans. Having lost his first wife, he married a creole, named Louise Moreau de Lassy, in 1805. He enjoyed great professional success in New Orleans, and paid in full the debt which he owed to the government. He was involved in a long controversy and litigation about the title to some land, called the Batture, which he purchased in New Orleans. President Jefferson was one of his adversaries in this dispute; but Livingston gained his cause. At the battle of New Orleans, January 8, 1815, he acted as aide-de-camp to General Jackson, who was his intimate friend. In 1821 he was authorized by the legislature of Louisiana to revise the system of criminal law. He acquired celebrity by his "System of Penal Law or Criminal Codes," published in 1833, in which he opposed capital punishment.

"This volume," says the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1864, "is a perfect treasure-house of juridical and legislative schemes and suggestions, doctrines and contrivances; and its indirect influence has been immense." M. Villemain declared the "System" to be "a work without example from the hand of any one man. . . . The lapse of time has deepened and strengthened the foundations of his fame."

He represented a district of Louisiana in Congress from 1823 to 1829, and was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of that State in the latter year. In April or May, 1831, he was appointed secretary of state by President Jackson. Having resigned this office in May, 1833, he was immediately appointed minister-plenipotentiary to France, where he is said to have "hit the happy medium between firmness and conciliation in diplomacy." He returned home about the end of 1835, and died at Rhinebeck, New York, in May, 1836. He had several children.

Livingston, (Rev. JOHN H.,) an American divine of the Dutch Reformed Church, born at Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1746. Having studied at Yale College and in Holland, where he received the degree of D.D., he became, on his return, pastor of the Dutch Church in New York. He was appointed professor of theology at Queen's College, New Jersey, in 1807, and president of that institution in 1810. Died in 1825.

Livingston, (PHILIP,) an American revolutionist, and signer of the Declaration of Independence, born at Albany in 1716. He graduated at Yale College in 1737, and in 1759 was elected a member of the General Assembly of the colony from the city of New York. In 1770 he was one of the committee appointed to correspond with the celebrated Edmund Burke, then agent for the colony of New York. He was elected a member of the Congress of 1774 and 1776. Died in 1778.

Livingston, (ROBERT,) the first possessor of the Livingston Manor, New York, was born in Scotland in 1654. He emigrated to New York about 1672, and obtained a grant of a large tract of land near the Hudson River. He was the ancestor of several eminent men named Livingston. He had three sons, PHILIP, ROBERT, and GILBERT, from the second of whom the statesmen Robert R. and Edward Livingston were descended.

Livingston, (ROBERT R.,) an American statesman, born in New York in 1746, was a brother of Edward Livingston, the great jurist. He graduated at King's College, New York, in 1765. He was a descendant of Robert, noticed above. As a member of the Congress of 1776, he was appointed one of the committee to draw up the Declaration of Independence. He became chancellor of the State of New York in 1777, was secretary for foreign affairs about two years, (1781–83,) and in 1801 was sent as minister to France, where he was very favourably received by Napoleon and assisted in the negotiation for the purchase of Louisiana. He returned home in 1805, after which he aided Robert Fulton in the introduction of steam-navigation, and promoted improvements in agriculture. Died in February, 1813.

See "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. iv.

Livingston, (WILLIAM,) an American jurist, brother of Philip, noticed above, was born in New York in 1741. Having removed to New Jersey, he was elected to the first Congress from that State in 1774. He became Governor of New Jersey in 1776, which office he filled for fourteen years. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution, (1787.) He was the author of a "Review of the Military Operations in North America from 1753 to 1758;" also of several political works, and of a poem entitled "Philosophical Solitude." Died in 1790.

Liv'ing-stọne or Liv'ing-stọn, (DAVID,) a Scottish missionary, distinguished as an explorer of Africa, was born at Blantyre, near Glasgow, March 19, 1813. He worked in a cotton-factory in his youth. Having studied medicine and theology, with an intention to labour as a missionary, he was sent by the London Missionary Society to South Africa in 1840. He laboured and travelled in the interior of Africa for sixteen years, and made important discoveries for which the Geographical Society awarded him a gold medal. He returned to England in 1856, and published an interesting work entitled "Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa," etc., (1857.) In 1858 he again went to Africa, as consul at Quilimane or Killimane, with a view to explore the river Zambesi, to promote the production of cotton, and to open commercial intercourse with the natives of that region. He returned to England in 1864, and about the end of 1865 published a "Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi, 1858–64." He set out again for Africa in 1865, explored a portion of the continent westward from Zanzibar, and, after enduring great hardship, succumbed to an attack of dysentery, and died on the south shore of Lake Bangweolo, May 1, 1873. His "Last Journals" were published in 1874.

Liv'ĭ-us An-dro-nī'cus, a popular Roman dramatist and actor, who began his career as an author about 240 B.C. The place of his birth is unknown. He is regarded as the earliest dramatic writer of Rome. He composed both tragedies and comedies, of which only small fragments now remain, and was the sole performer of his own plays, which were used in schools in the time of Horace. He was a writer of industry and learning rather than original genius.

Livoy, de, dẹh le'vwâ', (Père TIMOTHÉE,) a French friar and littérateur, born at Pithiviers in 1715. He published, in 1767, a "Dictionary of French Synonyms." Died in 1777.

Liv'ў, [Lat. LIV'IUS,] (TITUS,) [It. TITO LIVIO, tee'to lee've-o; Fr. TITE LIVE, tēt lēv,] a celebrated Roman historian, was born at Patavium (now Padua) in 59 B.C. Ancient writers furnish us few particulars of his life, except that he was patronized by Augustus and became a person of consideration at court. He appears to have passed the greater part of his time in Rome. Niebuhr favours the opinion that he was in early life a teacher of rhetoric. His great history of Rome, from the origin of the city to the year 9 B.C., was called by him "Annales," and was comprised in one hundred and forty-two books, of which thirty-five have come down to us entire,—viz., the first, third, and fourth decades, and five books of the fifth decade. We have also epitomes, by an unknown hand, of one hundred and forty books. The first book was probably published or written between 29 and 25 B.C. His dialogues on philosophy and politics, which, according to some writers, procured him the favour of Augustus, are not now extant.

The great popularity of his history must be ascribed to the excellence and beauty of his style and his wonderful powers of description. The numerous orations by which the history is diversified are models of eloquence. "The painting of the narrative," says Macaulay, in his essay entitled "History," in the "Edinburgh Review," "is beyond description vivid and graceful. The abundance of interesting sentiments and splendid imagery in the speeches is almost miraculous." But he was destitute of many qualifications essential to a historian of the first order. Incapable of broad philosophic views, and indisposed to profound research, he was more studious to exalt the national glory and produce a picturesque effect than to compose a true history. He made little use of public documents, and was not familiar with the antiquities of his country. His work is also deficient in the explanation of the original constitution of the state, the contests between the orders, the progress of civilization, and other domestic affairs. Livy was married, and had two or more children. Died at Padua in 17 A.D.

Llewellyn or Llywelyn, loo-ĕl'in, I., Prince of Wales, began to reign about 1190, and married a daughter of John, King of England. The latter afterwards invaded Wales and forced him to do homage. Llewellyn waged war against Henry III. about 1228. Being harassed by the rebellion of his youngest son Griffith, he made, in 1237, a treaty with Henry, and purchased peace by acknowledging himself the vassal of that king. He died in 1240, and was succeeded by his son David.

Llewellyn II. was the son of Griffith, and successor of his uncle David. He renewed the homage to Henry III., but conspired with the Earl of Leicester against him in 1263. Llewellyn and his allies were defeated at Evesham in 1265. In 1276 he was summoned by Edward I. to come and do homage; but he declined. Wales was then invaded and conquered by Edward in 1277. Llewellyn, having again revolted, was killed in battle in 1282.

Llorente, lo-rĕn'tà, (BERNARDO GERMANO,) a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1685; died in 1757.

Llorente, (Don FELIX,) a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1712, was successful in history, landscapes, and portraits. Died in 1787.

Llorente, (Don JUAN ANTONIO,) a learned Spanish historian, born near Calahorra, in Aragon, in 1756. Having been ordained as a priest, he was chosen vicar-general of the see of Calahorra in 1782. Favoured by Florida-Blanca or the king, he was appointed in 1789 secretary-general of the Inquisition, of which he became a determined adversary. In 1794 the Grand Inquisitor directed Llorente, whose opinions were known to be liberal, to write an exposition of the abuses of the Inquisition. In 1808 he embraced the party of the French invaders, was admitted into the council of state by King Joseph, and promoted the suppression of the Inquisition in 1809. On the expulsion of the French from Spain, in 1814, he went as an exile to Paris, where he published in 1817 his "Critical History of the Spanish Inquisition," which was his great work. It is said by Prescott to be the only authentic account of that institution. He also wrote "Historical Notices of the Basque Provinces," (1806–8.) Died in 1823.

Lloyd, loid, (CHARLES,) an English banker, eminent as a scholar and philanthropist, born in Birmingham in September, 1748, was a member of the Society of Friends. He was conspicuous as an advocate of the abolition of the slave-trade, and was a man of great influence in the community. He was an uncle of Thomas F. Buxton, and father of Anna Braithwaite. Died in 1828.

Lloyd, (CHARLES,) an English poet, born in Birmingham, was a son of Charles Lloyd, banker, noticed above, and was a friend of Coleridge, Lamb, and Southey. In 1796 he went to Bristol, and lived in the same house with Coleridge. Lloyd produced, besides other poems, "Nugæ Canoræ," ("Sounding Trifles," 1819,) "Desultory Thoughts in London," (1821,) and "The Duke of Ormond," a tragedy, (1822.) He translated the tragedies of Alfieri into English. Died in 1839.

Lloyd, (DAVID,) a British biographer, born in Merionethshire in 1625. He took orders, and successively held several benefices. Among his principal works is "The Statesmen and Favourites of England since the Reformation," (1665.) Died in 1691.

Lloyd, (EDWARD,) an English tenor-singer, born in London in 1845. He has considerable reputation as an oratorio and concert singer.

Lloyd, (HENRY,) a British officer, distinguished as a writer on tactics, was born in Wales about 1725. He served in the Seven Years' war, first in the Austrian army and afterwards in that of Prussia. About 1770 he obtained the rank of major-general in the Russian army, and was employed in a war against the Turks, but was suspected of being a secret agent of the English government. Suddenly quitting the Russian service, he went to Gibraltar, and gave valuable counsel to General Elliott respecting the siege of that fortress. He died at Huy in 1783, leaving an "Introduction to the History of the War between the King of Prussia and the Empress Maria Theresa," (1781,) a "Memoir on the Invasion and Defence of England," (1798,) and other works.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lloyd, (HENRY DEMAREST,) an American author, born at New York city in 1847. He was admitted to the New York bar in 1869, and removed to Chicago in 1872, becoming a journalist. He wrote "Wealth vs. Commonwealth," "Labor Copartnership," "A Country without Strikes," (1900,) etc.

Lloyd, (ROBERT,) an English poet, born at Westminster in 1733. He became an usher in the Westminster School, and a companion of Churchill, Colman, etc. His health and fortune were injured by dissipated habits. He composed an admired poem, "The Actor," (1760,) "The Capricious Lovers," a comic opera, and other works. Died in 1764.

See NEWTON, "Life of R. Lloyd;" KENRICK, "Life of Lloyd," 1774.

Lloyd, (WILLIAM,) a pious and learned English bishop, born in Berkshire in 1627. He was appointed Bishop of Saint Asaph in 1680, and was one of the bishops imprisoned by James II. in 1688 for refusing to publish in their churches the declaration of indulgence to Catholics and dissenters. He became almoner to William III., Bishop of Lichfield in 1692, Bishop of Worcester in 1699 or 1700, and almoner to Queen Anne a few years later. He furnished Burnet valuable materials for his history, and wrote several religious treatises. Died in 1717.

Loaysa, lo-ī'sâ, (GARCIAS,) a Spanish cardinal and eloquent preacher, born at Talavera about 1480. About 1524 he became confessor to Charles V. He was afterwards Bishop of Seville, and president of the Royal Council of the Indies. Died in 1546.

Lo'banoff-Rostof'ski, (ALEXIS,) PRINCE, a Russian statesman, born in 1824. He entered the public service in 1843, and occupied various positions till 1878, when he was made ambassador to Turkey, in 1879 to London, and in 1882 to Vienna, remaining there until 1895. He was thence transferred to Berlin, and afterwards made minister of foreign affairs, in which post he displayed great activity and ability. Died August 30, 1896.

Lobau, de, dĕh lo'bō', (GEORGES Mouton—moo'tôN',) COUNT, a French general, born in Phalsbourg in 1770. He entered the army in 1792, became aide-de-camp of Joubert in 1798, and aide-de-camp of Bonaparte in 1805. His services were rewarded by the rank of general of division in 1807. He displayed great courage at Eckmühl, Aspern, and Lobau in 1809, and received the title of Count de Lobau. In the invasion of Russia (1812) he was aide-major-general of the imperial guard. He fought at Lutzen and Bautzen in 1813, and was taken prisoner at Waterloo in 1815, after which he passed many years in retirement. During the revolution of 1830 he favoured the cause of Louis Philippe, who appointed him commander of the national guard in December, 1830, and gave him a marshal's bâton in 1831. Died in 1838.

Lobb, (THEOPHILUS,) an English physician, born in London in 1678. He practised with success in that city, and wrote medical works, among which are a "Treatise on the Small-Pox," (1731,) and "Medical Practice in Curing Fevers," (1735.) Died in 1763.

Lobe, lō'bĕ, (JOHANN CHRISTIAN,) a German musical composer, born at Weimar in 1797. He produced in 1833 "The Princess of Granada," an opera. His theoretic works are highly esteemed. Died July 27, 1881.

He became professor of ancient literature and eloquence at Königsberg in 1814. He published valuable editions of the "Ajax" of Sophocles, (1810,) and of Phrynicus, (1820.) Among his other most important works is "Pathologiæ Linguæ Græcæ Elementa," (1853.) Died in 1860.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lobeira or Lobeyra, de, dā lo-bā'e-rā, written also Loveira, (VASCO,) a celebrated Portuguese author, was born at Oporto about 1360. He was knighted by King John I. of Portugal on the battle-field of Aljubarrota in 1386, and died in 1403. He was the author of the famous romance "Amadis de Gaul," which is now seldom read. The earliest edition now known was printed in 1519. It passed for the best of the romances of chivalry until the satire of Cervantes rendered them all unpopular.

See TICKNOR'S "Spanish Literature," vol. i. chap. xi. p. 221 et seq.

Lobel or L'Obel, lō'bĕl', (MATHIEU,) an eminent botanist, born at Lille, France, in 1538. He practised medicine at Antwerp, and became physician to the Prince of Orange, after whose death he went to England, where he passed the most of his life. In 1570 Lobel and Pena published in London "Stirpium Adversaria," which presents the first sketch, though rude, of a natural method of botany, with neat engravings of about two hundred and seventy plants. He published in 1581 a valuable work entitled "Icones Stirpium," which contains figures of about two thousand plants, and is still, says Duvau, often consulted. Lobel was also physician to James I. Died near London in 1616. The genus Lobelia was named in honour of him.

Locke, lok, [Lat. LOC'KIUS,] (JOHN,) a celebrated English philosopher and philanthropist, born at Wrington, in Somersetshire, in 1632, was the son of Captain Locke, who served in the parliamentary army during the civil war. He studied at Westminster School, and in 1651 entered Christ Church, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by his talents and acquirements. He left Oxford with no very favourable views of the system of instruction there pursued. He had, indeed, been far more indebted for his mental culture to his own efforts than to the skill or labour of his tutors, and was himself an example of that self-teaching which in his writings he so strongly recommends. In 1665 Locke accompanied, as secretary, Sir Walter Vane, royal envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg. He returned to England in February, and soon after formed the acquaintance of Lord Ashley, (afterwards Shaftesbury,) who received him into the number of his most intimate and confidential friends. In 1672, Shaftesbury being then lord chancellor, Locke was appointed secretary for the presentation of benefices, but quitted this office in 1673, when his patron, having quarrelled with the court, resigned the great seal. In 1675 Locke visited the south of France on account of his health. He resided more than a year at Montpellier, and afterwards spent much time in Paris. He returned to his own country in 1679; but, Shaftesbury having been compelled by his enemies to leave England towards the close of 1682, Locke followed him to the continent in 1683, and passed several years in Holland. In 1688 he returned to his native land in the same fleet that conveyed the Princess of Orange to England. Soon after his arrival, he was offered by Lord Mordaunt the position of envoy to one of the European courts; but he declined the office on account of his feeble health; he accepted, however, the post of commissioner of appeals, which yielded him, it is said, two hundred pounds a year,—no inconsiderable sum for that period. The asthmatic affection under which he had been suffering for many years having become more aggravated, he resigned, in 1700, his position under the government, and retired to Oates, in Essex. Here he spent the remainder of his days at the house of Sir Francis Masham, whose accomplished lady was the daughter of the celebrated Dr. Cudworth. He died October 28, 1704.

Locke was no less distinguished for his virtues and piety than for his extraordinary intellectual endowments. All his writings may be said to have had for their object the improvement of mankind in knowledge, liberty, and virtue. Although he was in favour of the utmost freedom of investigation in regard to religious as well as other truths, he entertained for the Holy Scriptures the profoundest veneration. To a friend inquiring the best way to attain a true knowledge of the Christian religion, he answered, "Study the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament: therein are contained the words of eternal life. It has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error for its matter." A little before his death, while acknowledging that his life, on the whole, had been a happy one, he pronounced all sublunary enjoyments to be "vanity," and earnestly exhorted his friends to prepare for the endless life to come. He extolled the goodness of God in providing for the salvation of mankind through faith in Jesus Christ, and expressed particular gratitude that he had been led through divine goodness to the knowledge of the Saviour. (See a letter by Coste, the French translator of the "Essay on the Human Understanding," published February, 1705.) As a controversialist, Locke was remarkable not only for the clearness and cogency of his arguments, but also for the perfect fairness and respect with which he treated his opponents. His conversation, we are told, was a "happy union of wit and good sense;" so that his company was sought by many of the most distinguished men of that period,—such as Halifax, Buckingham, etc. As an evidence of the variety and extent of his attainments, we may mention that the great Sydenham, alluding to Locke's skill in medicine, gave it as his opinion that "in genius, penetration, and accurate judgment he had in that age few equals and scarcely any superior." From the character of Locke as given by Le Clerc, which he assures us "is an accurate and by no means flattered description," we take the following: "He was a profound philosopher, and a man fit for the most important affairs. He had much knowledge of belles-lettres, and his manners were very polite and particularly engaging. He knew something of almost everything which can be useful to mankind, and was thoroughly master of all that he had studied; but he showed his superiority by not appearing to value himself in any way on account of his great attainments. . . . He was very charitable to the poor, provided they were not the idle nor the profligate. . . . He was an exact observer of his word, and what he promised was sacred. He was scrupulous about recommending people whom he did not know; and he could not bring himself to praise those whom he did not think worthy." (See "Life of Locke," by Lord King, pp. 267–271.)

Locke's great work, entitled an "Essay on the Human Understanding," was first published in 1690, (three years after the appearance of Newton's "Principia,") although the original copy, still preserved and in his own handwriting, is dated 1671,—an evidence of his great caution (evinced also in his other works) with respect to offering his views to the public. The leading position of his essay is that the human mind has no innate ideas, and that all ideas, with their various combinations, are to be referred to sensation and reflection. His other publications were,—three "Letters on Toleration," (1690–92,) a "Treatise on Education," (1690,) one on the value of money, (1691,) "The Reasonableness of Christianity," (1695,) a first and second Vindication of the last-named work, (1696,) and three elaborate letters in defence of the "Essay on the Human Understanding" against Stillingfleet, Bishop of Winchester, (1697–99.) Locke's work on the "Conduct of the Human Understanding," and his "Discourse on Miracles," and "Commentaries on the Epistles of Saint Paul," were published after his death."

Locke, (JOHN,) M.D., an American geologist, born at Fryeburg, Maine, in 1792. He became professor of chemistry at Cincinnati in 1836. He was well versed in geology and natural history. Died in Cincinnati in 1856.

Locke, (JOSEPH,) M.P., F.R.S., an eminent English railway-engineer, born near Sheffield in 1805. He learned the business of engineering with the celebrated George Stephenson. He gained a high reputation as engineer of the Grand Junction Railway, (of which Birmingham is one of the termini,) completed in 1837. The London and Southampton Railway, under his direction, was opened in 1840. He was afterwards employed as engineer of the railways connecting Paris and Rouen, and Havre and Rouen, in France. For several years before his death he was a member of Parliament, in which he acted with the Liberal party. Died in 1860.

See "Life of Joseph Locke," by J. DEVEY, 1862.

Lock'er, (ARTHUR,) an English author, (brother of F. Locker,) was born in Greenwich Hospital, July 2, 1828. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1851. Among his works are "Sir Godwin's Folly," (1864,)

"Sweet Seventeen," (1866,) "Stephen Scudamore," (1868,) "On a Coral Reef," (1869,) "The Village Surgeon," (1874,) and many other tales, besides reviews, poems, etc. From 1870 until about 1892 he was editor of the London "Graphic." Died in 1893.

Lock'er, (FREDERICK,) an English poet, was born at Greenwich Hospital in 1821, the son of Edward Hawke Locker, (1777–1849,) author of "Leetures on the Bible," etc. His prineipal poems were "London Lyrics," (1857,) and "Patchwork," (1879.) He married the daughter of Sir Curtis Lampson and assumed the name of Locker-Lampson. Died in 1895.

Lockhart, (JOHN GIBSON,) a distinguished British author, poet, and critic, was born at the manse of Cambusnethan, in Lanarkshire, Scotland, in 1794. He was the son of a Presbyterian minister, who removed to Glasgow while the subject of this article was in his infancy. As a student in the Glasgow University he obtained a valuable bursary, in virtue of which he entered Baliol College, Oxford. He studied law, and was called to the Scottish bar in 1816, but preferred the profession of literature. He was one of the chief contributors to "Blackwood's Magazine" for about seven years after it was first established, in 1817. He advocated Tory principles in political articles which displayed a great mastery of sarcasm and invective. In 1820 he married Sophia, daughter of Sir Walter Scott. He produced in 1821 "Valerius, a Roman Story," which is much admired, and was followed by "Reginald Dalton, a Story of English University Life," (1823.) About this time he published elegant translations of "Ancient Spanish Ballads." In 1825 or 1826 he removed to London, and became editor of the "Quarterly Review," which he conducted with success until 1853, and for which he wrote many excellent critical and biographical articles. In 1843 he was appointed to the lucrative office of auditor of the duchy of Cornwall. His most important work is his "Life of Sir Walter Scott," (7 vols., 1838,) which ranks very high in respect to literary merit, and is surpassed in interest by few, if any, biographies in the English language. He also published a "Life of Robert Burns," (1825,) which was received with favour, and Lives of Theodore Hook and Napoleon I. His manners were reserved and even chilling. His last years were rendered unhappy by the loss of his wife and two sons. He died in 1854, leaving a daughter, who was the only surviving descendant of Sir Walter Scott when she was married to Mr. Hope.

Lockhart, (Sir WILLIAM,) of Lee, an able British statesman, born in 1621. He fought for Charles II., and was made prisoner at Preston, (1650.) In 1652 he entered the civil service of Cromwell, and in 1655 was sent as ambassador to Louis XIV. of France. He commanded the British at the siege of Dunkirk in 1658, and then became governor of that place. At the restoration of 1660 he was recalled. Died in 1675. "He was," says Clarendon, "a man of great address in treaty."

Lockhart, (Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER,) an English general, born in 1841. He joined the Bengal army in 1858, served in various campaigns, and was promoted lieutenant-general in 1894. He commanded the Punjab frontier force 1890–95, and was made commander-in-chief for India in 1897. Died March 18, 1900.

Lockhart, (WILLIAM EWART,) a British painter, born in Dumfriesshire in 1846. One of his best-known works is "Jubilee Celebration in Westminster Abbey," painted for the Queen, 1887-89.

Löfling or Loefling, löf'ling, (PETER,) a Swedish botanist, born at Tollforsbruch in 1729. He was a favourite pupil of Linnæus, by whose mediation he was appointed botanist to the King of Spain in 1751. He accompanied as naturalist an expedition sent by the Spanish government to South America in 1754. After brief explorations of the districts of Cumana and Guiana, he died in 1756. His "Excursion in Spain" ("Iter Hispanicum") was published in 1758 by Linnæus.

Lofn, lof'n, or Lov'na, [from lof, "praise," also "leave," "favour:" compare the German Lob and Verlaub,] in the Norse mythology, a goddess, who is especially favourable to lovers, by whom she is principally worshipped. Power is given to her to unite those who love each other, whatever obstacles may stand in the way. From a root cognate with her name the Swedes derive their förlofva and the Germans their verloben, signifying to "betroth."

Lof'tie, (WILLIAM J.,) a British author, born at Belfast in 1837. He was assistant chaplain at Chapel Royal, Savoy, 1871–95, and on the staff of "Saturday Review" 1874, and of the "National Observer" 1894. He wrote various works, historical and descriptive, including "A History of London," (2 vols., 1883,) "Westminster Abbey," (1890,) "Inns of Court," (1894,) etc.

Lof'tus, (AUGUSTUS,) LORD, an English diplomatist, was born in 1817, son of the Marquis of Ely. Entering the diplomatic service, he was, after serving in minor posts, appointed minister to Austria in 1858, to Prussia in 1860, and to Bavaria in 1862. In 1866 he was made ambassador to Prussia, in 1868 to the North German Confederation, and in 1871 to Russia. He was Governor of New South Wales 1879–85, and published, in 1892, "Diplomatic Reminiscences."

Lof'tus, (WILLIAM KENNETT,) an English archæologist, born at Rye about 1820. He explored the sites of ancient cities on the Euphrates and Tigris, and published a valuable work entitled "Travels and Researches in Chaldæa and Susiana," etc., (1857.) Died in 1858.

Lo'gan, a celebrated Indian chief, of the tribe of the Cayugas, whose original name was Tah-gah-jute, was born about 1725. His family having been murdered by a party of white men, he avenged himself by waging a destructive war on the Western settlers, in which the Indians were at length defeated. He was killed in 1780 in a skirmish with a party of Indians. Logan's regard for the whites caused him to be called by his countrymen "the Friend of the White Man." A granite monument was erected to his memory at Fair Hill Cemetery, near Auburn, in Cayuga county, New York.

Logan, (GEORGE,) an American physician and philanthropist, born near Philadelphia in 1753, was a grandson of James Logan, noticed below. He was an earnest advocate of peace, and went to France in 1798 in order to prevent a war between France and America. He represented Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States from 1801 to 1807. He acted with the Republicans, and was denounced by the Federalists for his voluntary services in France. Died in 1821.

Lo'gan, (JAMES,) a colonial statesman and author, born at Lurgan, Ireland, in 1674, was a member of the Society of Friends. He was master of the Greek, Latin, French, and German languages. In 1699 he accompanied William Penn to America as his secretary. Under the patronage of William Penn he was much employed in public affairs. He was appointed secretary of the province in 1701, after which he became chief justice and president of the council. He acted as Governor about two years after the death of Governor Gordon, in 1736. Among his works is a Latin treatise on the generation of plants, "Experimenta et Meletemata de Plantarum Generatione," (1739.) He produced a good version of Cicero "De Senectute," (1744.) He collected a library of about 3000 volumes, which is known under the name of the Loganian Library and is included in the Philadelphia Library. Died near Philadelphia in October, 1751.

See a "Memoir of James Logan," by W. ARMISTEAD.

Lo'gan, (JOHN,) a Scottish divine and poet, born at Soutra in 1748. He was appointed minister of Leith in 1773, and became an eloquent and popular preacher. He delivered in Edinburgh lectures "On the Philosophy of History," which were published in 1781. In this year he published a volume of admired poems, chiefly lyrical, among which is an "Ode to the Cuckoo." Having given offence to his church by writing "Runnimede," a tragedy, (1783,) he removed to London in 1785. There he wrote a pamphlet entitled "Review of the Charges against Warren Hastings," advocating the cause of Hastings. It led to the celebrated trial of Stockdale, his publisher. Died in 1788. His sermons were published in 1790, and are highly esteemed.

Logan, (JOHN A.,) an American general, born in Jackson county, Illinois, in February, 1826. He studied law, practising it until elected to Congress in 1858 and again in 1860. He raised a regiment in 1861 and took part in the civil war, becoming a major-general at the end of 1862, and serving as corps commander from October, 1863. In 1866 he was elected to Congress as a Radical. He was one of seven members selected, March 2, 1868, to manage the impeachment of President Johnson, and was re-elected to Congress in 1868. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1871, and re-elected in 1877 and in 1885. Died December 26, 1886. His son, of the same name, born 1865, rose to the rank of major in the regular army, fought in Cuba in 1898, and was killed in battle in the Philippines in 1899.

Logan, (OLIVE,) an American author, born at Elmira, New York, in 1839. She became a successful actress, and was the author of several works on theatrical life, etc., also of the comedy "Surf, or Life at Long Branch."

Logan, (Sir WILLIAM EDMOND,) a distinguished geologist, born at Montreal, Canada, in 1798. About 1842 he was appointed to superintend a geological survey of Canada. He received the gold medal of honour at the Paris Industrial Exhibition of 1855, and in 1856 the Wollaston palladium medal. He died June 22, 1875.

Logau, von, fon lo'gŏw, (FRIEDRICH,) BARON, a German poet, born in Silesia in 1604. He passed the latter part of his life in the service of the Duke of Liegnitz, and died in 1655, leaving a great number of epigrams, which were highly praised by Lessing and are remarkable for irony and pathos.

Loges, des, dā lozh, MADAME, a Protestant French lady, whose maiden name was MARIE BRUNEAU, (brü'nō',) was born at Sedan about 1584. Her house in Paris was frequented by Malherbe and other eminent wits, attracted by the charm of her conversation. Died in 1641.

Log'gan, (DAVID,) an eminent engraver and designer, born at Dantzic about 1635. He became a resident of London, where he published Engravings of the Colleges of Oxford, ("Oxonia Illustrata,") and similar illustrations of those of Cambridge. After the restoration of 1660, he engraved portraits of Charles II., and of many dukes, earls, prelates, etc. of his time. Died in 1693.

See STRUTT, "Dictionary of Engravers."

Lohaïa, Ibn, ĭb'n lo-hī'a, or Ibn-Lahîa, ĭb'n lā-hee'a, a Moslem doctor, born about 710 A.D. He was appointed Cadee of Egypt in 771, and died about 790. The traditions transmitted through him are of great authority among Egyptians. Silvestre de Sacy attaches importance to the historical traditions derived from him.

Lohenstein, von, fon lo'ĕn-stīn', (DANIEL CASPAR,) a German writer, born at Nimptsch, in Silesia, in 1635. He founded a literary school which corrupted the national taste, and wrote tragedies and other poems. "He was always tumid," says Hallam, "and striving at something elevated, so that the 'Lohenstein swell' became a byword with later critics." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1683.

Löher, von, fon lö'hĕr, (FRANZ,) a German author, born at Paderborn, October 15, 1818. He studied in several universities, and travelled extensively in America and Europe, and afterwards received a professorship at Munich. He published "Princes and Towns of the Times of the Hohenstaufens," (1846,) "History of the Germans in America," (1848,) "Naples and Sicily," (1864,) "A Reckoning with France," (1870,) "Nature and History of Alsace," (1871,) "Voyages on the Coasts of Greece," (1876,) and descriptions of his travels in the Canary Islands, Cyprus, etc. Died in 1892.

Lohurâsp, lo'hōō-râsp', written also Lohrasp, a Persian king, who was (according to the "Shâh Nâmeh") the father of Gushtâsp. He is supposed to have reigned about 550 B.C. According to the Arabian chronicles, his army took Jerusalem.

Loir, lwâr, (NICOLAS PIERRE,) a skilful French painter, born in Paris in 1624. After a visit to Rome, he returned in 1649, was received as Academician in 1663, and was patronized by Louis XIV., who gave him a pension of four thousand francs. He worked with facility, and was successful in history and landscapes. The picture of "Cleobis and Biton drawing the Chariot of their Mother" is called his master-piece. He etched about one hundred and fifty pieces of his own and of other artists. Died in 1679.

His brother ALEXIS, born about 1640, had a high reputation as an engraver. He engraved several works of Poussin, Lebrun, etc. Died at Paris in 1713.

Loiseau de Mauléon, lwâ'zō' dĕh mō'lā'ôN', (ALEXANDRE JÉRÔME,) an eloquent French advocate, born in Paris in 1728. He was a friend of Rousseau, who advised him to defend good causes exclusively. "He followed my counsel," says Rousseau, "and has found the advantage of it. His defence of M. de Portes is worthy of Demosthenes." Died in 1771.

See ROUSSEAU, "Confessions."

Loisel, lwâ'zĕl', (ANTOINE,) a French jurist, born at Beauvais in 1536. He wrote, besides other legal works, "Institutes coutumières," (1607,) a treatise on common law. Died in 1617.

Loiseleur-Deslongchamps, lwâz'lur'dā'lôN'shôN', (AUGUSTE LOUIS ARMAND,) a French Orientalist, born in Paris in 1805, gave special attention to the Sanscrit. His most important work is "The Book of the Laws of Manu," ("Manava-Dharma-Sastra," 1832.) Died in 1840.

Lok or Loke. See LOKI.

Loki, lo'ke, or Loke, lo'kĕh, written also Lok, [from the old Norse logi, (Ger. Lohe,) "flame," allied to the Latin luc-eo, to "shine," and to the Scottish lug, "fire;" probably so named because he united the subtlety and untrustworthiness (or treachery) of fire with its destroying properties,] in the Norse mythology, the god of evil and deceit, corresponding in the main with the Ahriman of the Zoroastrians. He is of Jötun (giant) descent, but was received among the gods, and in the beginning was a foster-brother of Odin. From his association with the Æsir, he is often styled ASA-LOKI or ASALOKE. He is called by various appellations; among others, the Slanderer or Accuser,—epithets exactly corresponding to the Greek διάβολος, (Latin Diab'olus.) He is the enemy and mocker, as well as tempter, of gods and men. As proof of his subtlety, he often changed his sex, assuming on different occasions the form of a mare, a cow, an old woman, etc., as well as that of the gods. The Æsir often made use of his cunning and strength; but still more frequently they had cause to rue those very powers employed against themselves. Professor Petersen furnishes perhaps the most philosophical and most satisfactory account of Loki and his various attributes that can anywhere be found. Among other things, he observes that "Asaloke forms an antagonism (modsætning) to all the other gods. He is the [principle of] evil exerting itself in every direction. He runs in the veins of mankind as sensuality. He is the destructive [power] of nature in air, in fire, and in water. In the bosom of the earth [he shows himself] as volcanic fire; in the sea as a devouring serpent; in the lower world (underverden) as pale Death. He is not confined to any one part of nature, but, like Odin, pervades it all. . . . And all that he is in [external] nature, the same is he in the mind of man: shrewdness, but also cunning and falsehood at the same time; spirit, but likewise craft, deceit, and malice. . . . And in each of these forms he continually becomes worse and worse; according to the old proverb, that 'everything grows worse as it grows older.'" ("Nordisk Mythologi," pp. 355–6.)

Through the deceitful malice of Loki, Balder, the beautiful and good, was slain by the hand of his blind brother Höder. (See BALDER.) By the female Jötun Angurboda, Loki was the father of the wolf Fenrir, of the World-Serpent, (or Midgard's Ormr,) and of Hela, the goddess of death. He is also fabled to have been (by a change of sex) the dam of the horse Sleipnir. The Æsir, exasperated on account of the death of Balder, determined at length to take vengeance on Loki. He had fled to the mountains, and there built himself a house which was open on four sides, whence he could see everything that happened throughout the world. By day he often transformed himself into a salmon, and hid himself in a waterfall. The gods, learning his hiding-place, attempted to catch him with a net; he sprang over the net, but Thor caught him by the tail. This is the reason, we are told, why the salmon has so thin and pointed a tail. Having thus captured Loki, the gods bound him with magic cords to three sharp stones. A venomous snake was then hung above his head, so that the poison might continually drip on his face. But his faithful wife Sigyn (sig'in) stands by him and catches the falling venom in a cup. When the cup is full, while she is emptying it the poison falls upon his face, which makes him howl with anguish and writhe his body so that the whole earth trembles. Loki will break loose from his bonds at Ragnaröck,* (the "twilight or evening of the gods,") when he will become the leading spirit among the enemies of the Æsir. He is not only the leader of Fenrir and the other progeny of evil, but he is said to steer the fatal ship Naglfar which conveys the sons of Muspel over the ocean. In the final conflict he will encounter Heimdall, and they will slay each other. Frey falls under the sword of Surt. Tyr slays and is slain by the dog Garm. Odin is devoured by the wolf Fenrir, which in turn is killed by Vidar. Thor slays the world-serpent, but dies immediately afterwards from the effects of its venom. Then Surt scatters fire over the earth, and the whole world is consumed. (See FENRIR.) We are told, however, that this destruction is not to last forever. A new earth, forever green and beautiful, will rise out of the sea. Vali and Vidar (the slayer of Fenrir) will survive the conflagration, and will be joined by Modi and Magni, the sons of Thor and Balder, and Höder will return from the realms of Hela. The sun before her destruction bore a daughter more beautiful than herself. As successor to her mother, she will pursue her appointed path through the renovated world. A new race shall fill the earth, and all evil come to an end.

Lokmân or Locmân, lok'mân', written also Loqmân, an ancient Arabian sage, celebrated for his wisdom, and supposed to be the author of a collection of popular Oriental fables. He is mentioned in the Koran, and is regarded as a contemporary of David and Solomon. One Arabian writer tells us that Lokmân (who is called "the oldest sage") was an Abyssinian slave belonging to an Israelite in the time of King David, and that he was a tailor by trade. Another writer says he had read more than 10,000 wise sayings and maxims, but none finer than those of Lokmân. It is related that Lokmân, being asked whence he had learned his wisdom, replied, "From the blind, who do not set down their feet until they know the place;" and when asked from whom he had learned good manners, he said, "From the ill-mannered, because I avoid everything offensive in them." Coincident traditions suggest the possible, if not probable, identity of Lokmân and Æsop. "Many passages of his history," says Silvestre de Sacy, "seem evidently borrowed from the life of Æsop." "Nothing in his fables is characteristic of Arabian genius; and they have received the name of Lokmân only because he was renowned for wisdom." They were edited and translated into Latin by Erpenius in 1615.

Lola Montez, lo'lâ mon'tĕz, (MARIA DOLORES PORRIS GILBERT,) a famous female adventurer, was born about 1820, at Limerick. At an early age she made her début at Paris as a danseuse, and by her beauty and genius attracted many admirers. About 1846 she went to Munich, where she captivated the king, Louis, who gave her the title of Countess of Lansfeld. After several ministers had been discarded by her influence, her enemies prevailed in 1848, and she retired from Bavaria. She was afterwards married twice, and lived in England and the United States, where she lectured with success in various cities. She published a volume of lectures, and was the reputed author of a work called "The Arts of Beauty, or Secrets of a Lady's Toilet." She died in New York in 1861.

See "Fraser's Magazine" for January, 1848.

Loli, lo'lee, (LORENZO,) an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1612, was a pupil of Guido Reni. His most admired works are etchings, after Guido, Sirani, etc. Died in 1691.

Lol'lard or Lol'hard, (WALTER,) a person of whom we have little information, except that he was burned to death as a heretic at Cologne in 1322. His followers or fellow-believers, called "Lollards," were a numerous sect in England many years after his death. Their doctrines appear to have been similar to those of the Protestants. The term Lollard was applied to the disciples of Wickliffe by their opponents. In the reign of Henry V. (1414) the Lollards were persecuted, and revolted without success. (See COBHAM, LORD.)

Lolli, lol'lee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian violinist, born at Bérgamo in 1728; died in 1802.

Lol'lĭ-a Pau-lī'na, a Roman empress, whose beauty captivated Caligula. She was married to him in 38 A.D., but was soon discarded by the capricious emperor. She was put to death in 49 A.D. by the order of Agrippina, who was prompted to this act by jealousy.

Lol-lĭ-ā'nus, [Λολλιανός,] a Greek sophist and writer on rhetoric, born at Ephesus, lectured at Athens in the reign of Hadrian, (117–138 A.D.)

See KAYSER, "P. Hordeonius Lollianus geschildert," etc., 1841.

Lollio, lol'le-o, (ALBERTO,) an Italian orator and poet, born at Florence in 1508. He published elegant orations and letters, and several poems, among which is "Arethusa," a pastoral drama, (1563.) Died in 1568.

Lol'lĭ-us, (M.,) a Roman general in the service of Augustus. He was defeated in Gaul by the Germans in 16 B.C. Died in 3 A.D.

Lom'ax, (JOHN TAYLOE,) an American lawyer, born in Virginia in 1781, was appointed in 1826 professor of law in the University of Virginia. Died Oct. 10, 1862.

Lomazzo, lo-mät'so, (GIOVANNI PAOLO,) an Italian painter and able writer on art, was born at Milan in 1538. He was appointed by Cosimo de' Medici keeper of his vast gallery of pictures in Florence. He was versed in belles-lettres and various sciences, and acquired a profound theoretical and practical knowledge of the fine arts. Having become blind in the prime of life, he composed his "Trattato della Pittura," (1584,) "the most complete treatise on painting," says the "Biographie Universelle," "that has hitherto appeared." His praises were sung by the first Italian poets of his time. He also published "Idea (or Image) of the Temple of Painting," ("Idea del Tempio della Pittura," 1591.) Died about 1600.

Lombart, lôn'bȧr', (PIERRE,) a French engraver, born in Paris in 1612. Among his works are twelve portraits, after Van Dyck, a "Nativity," after Poussin, and a "Penitent Magdalene," after Titian. Died in 1682

Lombert, lôn'bair', (PIERRE,) a French translator, born in Paris, was an associate of the Port-Royalists. He produced French versions of the works of Saint Cyprian, (2 vols., 1672,) and of Saint Augustine's "City of God," (2 vols., 1675.) Died in 1710.

Lombro'so, (CÆSAR,) an Italian anthropologist, born, of Jewish descent, at Venice in 1836. He studied medicine, and held professorships successively at Pavia, Pesaro, and the University of Turin. He became a noted authority on insanity and on crime in its relation to the physical organization. Among his many works may be named "Genius and Insanity," (1864,) "Microcephalism and Cretinism," (1873,) "The Man of Genius," (1888,) and "The Female Offender," (1895.) His greatest work, "L'Homme Criminel," (1875,) unfolds his theory of congenital tendency to crime.

Lomeier, lo'mī'ẹr, written also Lomeir, (JAN,) a learned Dutch philologist, born at Zutphen in 1636. He became minister of the church in that town in 1674, and professor of belles-lettres there in 1686. He published a curious treatise "On Libraries," ("De Bibliothecis," 1669,) and a work on ancient history and philology, entitled "Dierum Genialium." Died in 1699.

See SAX, "Onomasticon."

Loménie, de, dẹh lo'mā'ne', (HENRI AUGUSTE,) Count de Brienne, a French statesman, born in Paris in 1594. At the age of twenty he obtained the reversion of the office of secretary of state, which his father had held. In 1624 he was sent to England to draw up the articles of the marriage between Henrietta of France and the Prince of Wales. He retired from office in 1661, and died in 1666.

Loménie, de, (LOUIS HENRI,) Count de Brienne, the son of the preceding, was born in 1635. About the age of twenty-six he resigned the office of secretary of foreign affairs, and became a priest of the Oratory. He wrote poems, memoirs, and other works, which have some literary merit. He was expelled from the order of the Oratory for eccentric or improper conduct, and was deranged many years. Died in 1698.

See "Mémoires de L. H de Loménie," 2 vols., 1720.

Loménie, de, (LOUIS LÉONARD,) a French author, born in Haute-Vienne in 1818. He began his literary career by a series of biographies, entitled "Gallery of Illustrious Contemporaries, by a Man of no Account," ("Galerie des Contemporains illustres, par un Homme de Rien," 10 vols., 1840–47,) which procured for him an honourable reputation for good taste, discretion, and other merits. Many of these biographies have been published separately. Among his works is "Beaumarchais and his Times: Studies on French Society," (2 vols., 1855.) Died April 2, 1878.

Loménie de Brienne, de, dẹh lo'mā'ne' dẹh brē'ẹn', (ÉTIENNE CHARLES,) a French cardinal and minister of state, born in Paris in 1727. He was appointed Archbishop of Toulouse in 1763. In 1770 he was elected to the French Academy. In May, 1787, he succeeded Calonne as contrôleur-général of finances, without abilities adequate to the crisis. An exciting contest arose between the court and the Parliament of Paris, which was exiled from the capital and deprived of political power. In 1788 he was invested with the title of prime minister and made Archbishop of Sens. In this year, yielding to the importunate appeals of the people, then in a state of great excitement, he convoked the States-General for May, 1789. Having been so unsuccessful as a financier that he was compelled to suspend payments, he was dismissed on the 24th of August, 1788, and Necker became premier. He was one of those in the new régime who took the oath as a constitutional bishop. Died in 1794.

Lomi, lo'mee, (ARTEMISIA,) an Italian painter, born at Pisa in 1590, was a daughter of Orazio Lomi, and a pupil of Guido. She had a high reputation as a portrait-painter, and painted some historical works, among which is "Judith and Holofernes." She died in London or Naples about 1644.

Lomi, (AURELIO,) an Italian painter, born at Pisa in 1556, is called one of the chiefs of the school of Pisa. He painted frescos and oil-paintings in Rome, Genoa, Florence, Pisa, etc. Among his admired works are a Saint Jerome and "Adoration of the Magi." Died in 1622.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy:" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie."

Lomi, (BACCIO,) an Italian painter, an uncle of the preceding, born at Pisa, lived about 1570–1600. He worked at Pisa with success, and founded a school.

Lomi, (ORAZIO,) an Italian painter, called GENTILESCHI, a brother of Aurelio, noticed above, was born at Pisa about 1563. He worked in Rome, where he was employed by Agostino Tassi to paint figures. About 1623 he removed to London, where he was patronized by Charles I. Among his works are a "Repose in Egypt," and an "Assumption." Died in London in 1646.

Lomm, lom, [Lat. LOM'MIUS,] (JOSSE,) one of the most skilful physicians of his time, was born at Buren, in Holland, in 1500. He practised at Tournai and at Brussels, whither he removed about 1557. In his "Medicinal Observations" ("Observationes Medicinales," 1560) many diseases are accurately described. He wrote other works, in Latin of uncommon purity. Died after 1562.

Lomonosof, Lomonossov, Lomonosov, or Lomonosow, lom-o-no'sof, (MICHAEL VASILIEVITCH,) a celebrated Russian poet, born at or near Kolmogory, in the government of Archangel, in 1711, is called the father of modern Russian literature. He was the son of a serf, whom he assisted in the business of a fisherman until his thirst for knowledge led him to Moscow, and thence to Saint Petersburg, in 1734. He became learned in ancient and modern languages and in abstract and natural sciences. In 1746 he was appointed professor of chemistry, and in 1760 rector of the gymnasium and University of Saint Petersburg. He rendered the Russian language more polished and more rich by his multifarious productions, in prose and verse, on grammar, history, chemistry, rhetoric, etc. His poem entitled "Petriade" (an unfinished epic, of which Peter the Great is the hero) is one of his most popular works. He also pro-

Londe, de la, dẹh lȧ lôNd, (FRANÇOIS RICHARD,) a French poet, born at Caen in 1685; died in 1765.

Londerseel, lon'dẹr-sāl', (ASSUR.) a Dutch landscape-painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1550.

Londerseel, van, vȧn lon'dẹr-sāl', (JAN,) a Flemish engraver, born at Bruges about 1580.

Lon'don-der'ry, (CHARLES WILLIAM STEWART,) third MARQUIS OF, born in Dublin in 1778, was a son of Robert the first Marquis, and a half-brother of Lord Castlereagh. His mother was a daughter of Lord Chancellor Camden. He entered the army in 1793, became colonel and aide-de-camp to the king in 1803, and distinguished himself in Portugal under Sir John Moore. He served as adjutant-general under Sir Arthur Wellesley for several years in the Peninsula. In 1813 Sir Charles was envoy-extraordinary to the court of Berlin, and was officially attached to the head-quarters of Bernadotte. Much importance is ascribed to the efforts and menaces by which he induced Bernadotte to co-operate with the allies at Leipsic. He was raised to the peerage, as Lord Stewart, in 1814, and was one of the plenipotentiaries sent by England to the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Having married a daughter and heiress of Sir Harry Vane Tempest in 1819, he assumed the name of Vane. He succeeded his half-brother as Marquis of Londonderry in 1822, and obtained the rank of general in 1837. He was author of a "History of the Peninsular War," (1813.) He died in 1854.

Londonderry, MARQUIS OF. See CASTLEREAGH.

Londonio, lon-do'ne-o, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter of animals, born at Milan in 1723; died in 1783.

Long, (EDWARD,) an English writer, born in Cornwall in 1734. He emigrated in 1757 to Jamaica, where he was appointed a judge. Having returned to England in 1769, he published a "History of Jamaica," (1774,) and several minor works. Died in 1813.

Long, (GEORGE,) an eminent English scholar and editor, born at Poulton, Lancashire, in 1800. Having been educated at Cambridge, he became professor of ancient languages in the University of Virginia in 1824, and professor of Greek in the London University in 1826. About this time he became a member of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," under whose auspices he edited the "Penny Cyclopædia," with great ability, from 1832 to 1843. He afterwards edited for the same society a "Biographical Dictionary," which was discontinued at the end of the letter A. He contributed many articles to Smith's "Classical Dictionary," edited Cicero's Orations, and published, besides other works, "France and its Revolutions," (1850,) and "The Decline of the Roman Republic," (5 vols., 1864–74.) He translated into English the "Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus." He was one of the professors in the college at Brighton from 1849 to 1871. Died August 10, 1879.

Long, (JOHN DAVIS,) an American statesman, born at Buckfield, Maine, in 1838. He studied law and practised in Boston, was a member of the Massachusetts legislature 1875–78, (speaker 1876–78,) lieutenant-governor 1879, governor 1880–82, member of Congress 1883–89, and was appointed secretary of the navy in McKinley's cabinet 1897.

Long, (ROGER,) F.R.S., an English astronomer, born in the county of Norfolk in 1680. He became Lowndes professor of astronomy at Cambridge in 1749, and afterwards obtained the rectory of Bradwell. He wrote a "Treatise on Astronomy," of which the first volume was published in 1742 and the second in 1764. Died in 1770.

Long, (STEPHEN H.,) an American engineer, born at Hopkinton, New Hampshire, in 1784. About 1816 he set out on a tour for exploring the western frontier from Texas to the sources of the Mississippi, and published in 1824 his "Expedition to the Source of Saint Peter's River, Lake of the Woods," etc. Died Sept. 4, 1864.

Long, Le. See LELONG.

Lon'gard de Longgarde, (DORETHEA,) an English novelist, (born Gerard,) in Lanarkshire, 1855. She wrote several novels in conjunction with her sister Emily, (see GERARD, EMILY,) and, after her marriage in 1886, a considerable number independently, including "A Queen of Curds and Cream," (1892,) "A Forgotten Sin," (1898,) etc.

Longepierre, de, dẹh lôNzh'pe-air', (HILAIRE BERNARD DE REQUELEYNE,) BARON, a French poet, born at Dijon in 1658. He was an excellent Greek scholar, and produced poetical versions of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, and Moschus. His tragedy of "Medea," says Voltaire, although too full of declamation, is superior to Corneille's "Medea." Died in 1721.

Longet, lôN'zhȧ', (FRANÇOIS ACHILLE,) a French physician and physiologist, born at Saint-Germain-en-Laye in 1811. He published "Anatomy and Physiology of the Nervous System," (2 vols., 1843–46,) and a "Complete Treatise on Physiology," (1850–55.) He became consulting physician of the emperor. Died in 1871.

Long'fel-lō, (HENRY WADSWORTH,) an eminent American poet and scholar, born at Portland (Maine) the 27th of February, 1807. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1825, soon after which he was appointed professor of modern languages and literature in that institution, with the understanding that he should have the privilege of spending some time in Europe in order more fully to qualify himself for his new position. He left home in 1826, and spent four years abroad, chiefly in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. In 1835 he succeeded Mr. George Ticknor in the chair of modern languages and belles-lettres at Harvard. The same year he visited Europe the second time; and, after making an extensive tour through Denmark, Sweden, Germany, etc., he entered upon the duties of his professorship in 1838. In 1839 appeared his romance of "Hyperion," and a collection of his poems, entitled "Voices of the Night," which attracted great attention and raised him at once to the first rank among American poets. In 1841 he published "Ballads, and other Poems;" his charming drama of "The Spanish Student" appeared in 1843. This was followed by his "Poets and Poetry of Europe," (1845,) "The Belfry of Bruges, and other Poems," (1846,) and "Evangeline," (1847,) one of the most admired of all his productions. It has been pronounced (and we think justly) "the most perfect specimen extant of the rhythm and melody of the English hexameter." It was followed by "The Golden Legend," (1851,) "The Song of Hiawatha," (1855,) perhaps the most popular of all his works, "The Courtship of Miles Standish," (1858,) "Flower de Luce," (1866,) "New England Tragedies," (1868,) "The Divine Tragedy," (1872,) "Three Books of Song," (1873,) "Aftermath," (1874,) "The Hanging of the Crane" and "The Masque of Pandora," (1875,) "Keramos," (1878,) "Ultima Thule," (first part, 1881; second part,—"In the Harbour,"—1882.) A posthumous drama, "Michael Angelo," appeared in 1883. Of his prose writings, besides "Hyperion," already referred to, we may mention "Outre-Mer: a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea," (1835,) "Kavanagh," a novel, (1849,) and his contributions to the "North American Review." He also published a careful and scholarly translation of Dante's "Divine Comedy," (3 vols., 1867–70,) and edited a series of volumes entitled "Poems of Places." Longfellow resigned his chair at Harvard in 1854, and was succeeded by Lowell. In 1868–69 he travelled in Europe, and was everywhere received with marked attention, the degree of D.C.L. being conferred on him by the Universities of both Oxford and Cambridge, England. He died at Cambridge, Massachusetts, March 24, 1882.

As a poet, Longfellow is characterized by tenderness and depth of feeling, to the expression of which the picturesque and graceful simplicity of his language often imparts an indescribable charm. He seldom or never attempts to excite admiration by far-sought conceits, by wild or lofty flights of imagination, or by the exhibition of dark and terrible passions. He relies chiefly for his success on a simple and direct appeal to those sentiments which are common to all mankind,—to persons of every rank and of every clime.

It is, in fact, to his command over those feelings which are universal in the human heart, that we must ascribe the extraordinary popularity of his Indian story of "Hiawatha." It is, perhaps, not too much to say that he is not merely the first but the only writer who has succeeded in giving a deep and living interest to a story of Indian life. Restricted as he necessarily was by the nature of the subject,—by the extreme simplicity, not to say meagreness, of the character of our aborigines,—he has yet produced a poem which not only comes home to the hearts of the masses of the people, but which must excite the admiration of the cultivated reader who will take into consideration the inherent difficulties of the task, and the limits and restrictions which the poet, in selecting such a subject, had necessarily to impose upon himself. The form of the verse is in admirable keeping with the simplicity of the story. "But, unhappily for the poet," as has been observed, "this is the very measure to attract the parodist," and, immediately upon the issue of the poem, countless parodies were made upon it. Those, however, who can appreciate the intrinsic merits of true poetry find much that is beautiful and excellent in the "Song of Hiawatha." Several different translations of it have been made,—one by the distinguished German poet Freiligrath,—and it has been read and admired in every part of Europe.

Longhi, lon'gē, (ALESSIO or ALESSANDRO,) a Venetian painter and engraver, born in 1726; died about 1790.

Longhi, (GIUSEPPE,) a celebrated Italian engraver, born at Monza, in Lombardy, in 1766. He was a pupil of Vincenzo Vangelisti. He worked mostly at Milan, where he became professor in the Academy of Fine Arts. His works are admired for the magical effect of the chiaro-scuro. He was an excellent draftsman. Among his master-pieces are "The Marriage of the Virgin," after Raphael, "The Magdalene," after Correggio, a "Galatea," after Albani, and "The Last Judgment," after Michael Angelo. He published "La Calcographia," (1830,) an able treatise on engraving. Died in 1831.

Longhi, lon'gē, or Lunghi, loon'gē, (LUCA,) an Italian painter, born at Ravenna in 1507, always resided in that city. He excelled in portraits, and also painted some subjects of sacred history with success. Died in 1580. "His conceptions," says Lanzi, "are sweet, varied, and graceful, with a powerful union of colours." His daughter BARBARA was also a painter.

Longinus. See DLUGOSZ.

Lon-gī'nus, [Gr. Λογγῖνος; Fr. LONGIN, lôN'zhâN'; It. LONGINO, lon-jee'no,] a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic, was born probably in Syria, and flourished in the third century. Some ancient writers call him LONGINUS CASSIUS, or DIONYSIUS CASSIUS LONGINUS. He was a pupil of his uncle Phronto of Emesa, and was a Platonist in philosophy. He opened at Athens a school of philosophy and rhetoric, which became very celebrated. The famous Porphyry was one of his pupils. After passing many years at Athens, he accepted the invitation of Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, to reside at her court. He taught her Greek, and served her as councillor or prime minister during her war against Aurelian, Emperor of Rome. The latter, having captured Palmyra, put Longinus to death in 273 A.D. Longinus was the first to whom was applied the phrase, often repeated since, "a living library," and is considered the greatest philosopher of his age. He wrote many critical and philosophical works, none of which have come down to us except his admirable "Treatise on the Sublime," (Περὶ Ὕψους,) which Boileau translated into French and called a "master-piece of good sense, learning, and eloquence." Some writers, however, have doubted—but with little reason, it would seem—whether Longinus was the real author of this work. (See, on this subject, the article "Longin" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale.")

It has been truly said that to be a good critic one must be something of a poet. This qualification Longinus possessed in a pre-eminent degree. Pope, addressing him, says,

> "Thee, bold Longinus! all the Nine inspire,
> And bless their critic with a poet's fire;
> An ardent judge, who, zealous in his trust,
> With warmth gives sentence, yet is always just;
> Whose own example strengthens all his laws,
> And is himself that great sublime he draws."
> Essay on Criticism, part iii.

Of Longinus's "Treatise on the Sublime," several good French translations have been made,—one by the celebrated critic and poet Boileau, (1674.) It has also been translated into German by Schlosser, and into English by W. Smith.

Long'land or Lang'land, (JOHN,) an English bishop, born at Henley in 1473. He became confessor to Henry VIII., and Bishop of Lincoln, in 1520. On the question of the divorce of Queen Catherine he gave the king such counsels as were most agreeable to the latter. His sermons were published. Died in 1547.

Longland, Langelande or Langley, (WILLIAM,) an early English poet, a native of Shropshire, was a contemporary of Chaucer, and a disciple of Wickliffe. He was the reputed author of a celebrated poem called the "Visions of Piers Plowman," (1369.) It is a satire directed against the vices of the clergy and other professions, and displays considerable fancy and originality.

Long'man, (THOMAS NORTON,) an English merchant and publisher, born about 1770, was honourably and widely known as the head of the great publishing-firm of Longman & Company, Paternoster Row, London. He published works for Scott, Wordsworth, and Thomas Moore. Died in 1842.

Longmuir, long'mūr, (JOHN,) LL.D., a Scottish Free Church clergyman, born near Stonehaven, November 13, 1803. He graduated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1825. Besides many volumes of prose and verse, he prepared several dictionaries, and was one of the editors of "Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary." Died May 7, 1883.

Longobardi, lon-go-baR'dee, (NICCOLÒ,) a Jesuit, born in Sicily in 1565. He went to China as a missionary in 1596, and wrote a "Treatise on Confucius and his Doctrine," ("De Confucio ejusque Doctrina Tractatus.") Leibnitz published a new edition of this work, with notes. Died at Pekin in 1655.

Longolius, long-go'le-ŭs, (JOHANN DANIEL,) a German scientific writer, born at Meissen in 1677; died in 1740.

Longolius, (PAUL DANIEL,) a learned German writer, born near Dresden in 1704. He was rector of the gymnasium of Hof for forty-four years, and was one of the editors of the "German Encyclopædia, or Universal Lexicon," of Zedler, (Leipsic, 1731–50.) He also published editions of Pliny the Younger, and of Aulus Gellius. Died in 1779.

See G. W. KIRSCH, "Vier Programme von P. D. Longolii Leben," 1779–81; "Life of Longolius," prefixed to his "Notitia Hermundorum maximæque Partis Germaniæ," by ERNESTI, 1793.

Longomontan. See LONGOMONTANUS.

Longomontanus, lon'go-mon-tā'nŭs, [Fr. LONGOMONTAN, lôN'go'môN'tôN',] (CHRISTIAN,) a Danish astronomer, born in 1562 at Langsberg, (Jutland,) of which place he assumed the name, Latinizing it, according to the custom of the time. He was the son of a poor labourer, whose family name was SEVERIN. He obtained the favour of Tycho Brahe, whom he assisted in calculations and observations at Huen, or Hoëne, from 1589 to 1597. From 1605 to 1645 he was professor of mathematics in the Academy of Copenhagen. He died in 1647. Among his principal works are "First Part of a Mathematical System," ("Systematis Mathematici Pars I.," 1611,) "Danish Astronomy," ("Astronomia Danica," 1622,) "Pentas Problematum Philosophiæ," (1623,) and "Invention of the Quadrature of the Circle."

Longpérier, de, dẹh lôN'pā'rę-ā', (HENRI ADRIEN PRÉVOST,) a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1816, wrote treatises on numismatics, etc. Died in 1882.

Long'street, (AUGUSTUS BALDWIN,) son of William, noticed below, was born in Augusta, Georgia, in 1790. He became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was appointed president of the South Carolina College in 1857. He died September 9, 1870.

Longstreet, (JAMES,) an able American general, born in South Carolina in 1821, graduated at West Point in 1842. He served in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and was breveted major for his conduct at Molino del Rey. In 1852 he obtained the rank of captain. He resigned his commission about June, 1861, commanded a brigade in the Confederate army at Bull Run, July 21, and became a major-general soon after that date. He took part in the battles near Richmond in May and June, 1862, and commanded the right wing of General Lee's army at Antietam, September 17. Having been raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, he commanded a corps at the battle of Gettysburg, July 2–3, 1863. In the September ensuing he joined the army of General Bragg, under whom he served at Chickamauga, September 19–20. He commanded a force which General Bragg sent against Burnside in October, 1863; and he attempted to take Knoxville in November, without success. In the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, he was severely wounded, but resumed his command during the siege of Petersburg. At the close of the war he unreservedly accepted the situation, and was subsequently appointed by President Grant surveyor of the port of New Orleans. In 1880–81 he was minister to Turkey. He subsequently became United States marshal for Georgia, and in 1897 was made a commissioner of railroads.

Longstreet, (WILLIAM,) an American inventor, born in New Jersey, removed to Georgia. He obtained a patent for an improvement in the cotton-gin. Died in 1814.

Longueil, de, dẹh lôN'gŭl' or lôN'gŭh'yę, [Lat. LONGO'LIUS,] (CHRISTOPHE,) an eminent French scholar, born at Malines in 1490. He practised law in Paris, and was chosen conseiller au parlement. Afterwards he removed to Padua, and devoted himself to literature. He was one of the Latin scholars whose fastidious purity Erasmus ridiculed in his "Ciceronianus," and who affected to use no terms which were not found in Cicero's works. He was author of discourses against Luther, of "Letters to Bembo and Sadolet," etc. Died in 1522.

Longueval, lôNg'vȧl', (JACQUES,) a French Jesuit born near Péronne in 1680. He taught rhetoric and theology in various colleges, and was author of the first eight volumes of a "History of the Gallican Church," (1730–49,) which was continued by Fontenay and others. Died in 1735.

Longueville, lôNg'vęl', (EDME PAUL MARCELLIN,) a French Hellenist, born in Paris in 1785; died in 1855.

Longueville, de, dẹh lôNg'vęl', (ANNE GENEVIÈVE de Bourbon-Condé — dẹh boor'bôN' kôN'dā',) DUCHESS, a French lady, distinguished for beauty, tact, and talent, was born at Vincennes in 1619. She was a sister of the great Condé, and was married to the Duc de Longueville, noticed below, in 1642. The enmity between the parliaments and Mazarin gave rise to the faction or conspiracy of the Fronde, of which she became the heroine. Her nonchalance and languor were agreeably diversified by surprising and splendid awakenings of genius. She exercised great influence over the chiefs of the Fronde, and had a liaison with La Rochefoucauld, who was one of the leaders of that party. When her husband and brothers were imprisoned by Mazarin in 1650, she escaped to Stenay, the head-quarters of Turenne, whom she induced to join the party of the Fronde. With his aid she effected the release of her three friends in 1651, and returned to Paris in triumph. Peace was made between the Frondeurs and the court in 1659, after which she ceased to meddle with politics. She became devout, and spent much time in her latter years at the cloister of Port-Royal. Cardinal Mazarin once said, "We have three women in France who would be competent to govern or overturn three great kingdoms, namely, the Duchess de Longueville, the Princess Palatine, and the Duchess de Chevreuse." Died in 1679.

Longueville, de, (CHARLES PARIS D'ORLÉANS,) DUC, a son of the preceding, born in Paris in 1640, inherited the brilliant qualities of his mother. He served in the army of his uncle the Prince of Condé, and was killed at the passage of the Rhine in 1672, when the Polish deputies were on their way to offer him the crown of Poland.

Longueville, de, (HENRI,) DUC, a French general, born in 1595, was the son of Henri d'Orléans, a prince of the blood, and was a grand-nephew of Henry IV. In the reign of Louis XIII. he distinguished himself by military exploits in Italy, etc. He married the sister of the Prince of Condé in 1642, and supported the party of the latter in the time of the Fronde. Died in 1663.

Lon'gus, [Λόγγος,] a Greek sophist or author, of whom little or nothing is known. He is supposed to have lived in the fourth or fifth century of our era, and to have been the author of an ingenious prose romance entitled Ποιμενικὰ τα κατὰ Δάφνιν καὶ Χλόην, ("Pastorals relating to Daphnis and Chloe,") sometimes called "Loves of Daphnis and Chloe." It is admired for a charming, elegant style, and other literary merits. In 1810 Paul Louis Courier found at Florence a manuscript of Longus which supplied a hiatus of all the other manuscripts. He published a complete edition of the original and a corrected edition of Amyot's French version.

Loo'mis, (ELIAS,) an American astronomer and physicist, born in Tolland county, Connecticut, in 1811, graduated at Yale College in 1830. He became professor of natural philosophy at the Western Reserve College, Ohio, in 1837, in the New York University in 1844, and in Yale College in 1866. He made valuable contributions to the discussion of the subjects of magnetism, astronomy, and meteorology, and published several text-books of mathematics, astronomy, and the natural sciences. Died August 15, 1889.

Loon. See VAN LOON.

Loon, van, vän lōn, (THEODORE,) a Flemish painter, born at Brussels about 1630. His design was correct, and his colouring excellent. After working with Carlo Maratta at Rome, he returned to Brussels, where he confirmed his reputation by many historical paintings in the manner of Maratta. Some of the churches of Rome and Florence are adorned with his works. Died in 1678.

Loop, (HENRY A.,) an American artist, born at Hillsdale, New York, September 9, 1831. He studied art in New York under H. P. Gray, in Paris under Couture, and in Italy. He was chosen to the National Academy in 1861. He won distinction alike by his portraits and ideal works. Among the latter are "Undine," (1863,) "Improvvisatrice," (1869,) "The Italian Minstrel," (1869,) "Echo," (1879,) "Love's Crown," (1882,) and "The Summer Moon," (1884.)

Loop, (JENNETTE S. HARRISON,) an American artist, born at New Haven, Connecticut, March 5, 1840. Her studies and instructors were much the same as those of her husband, H. A. Loop. Among her ideal groups are "Baby Belle," "Little Runaway," "A Bouquet for Mama," and "Blowing Bubbles;" but her greatest distinction is as a portrait-painter. Her portraits take rank among the best ever painted in America. She was chosen an associate of the National Academy in 1875.

Loopolof, Loupolov, or Lupolow, loo'po-lof, (PRASCOVIA,) a Russian heroine, born in 1784, was a daughter of an officer exiled to Siberia. She performed on foot the journey from Tobolsk to Saint Petersburg, and obtained a pardon for her father. Her adventures form the subject of Madame Cottin's "Elizabeth, or the Exiles of Siberia." Died in 1809.

Loos, lōs, [Lat. CALLID'IUS,] (CORNELIS,) a Dutch Catholic theologian, born at Gouda about 1545. He was persecuted for opposing the prevalent superstitious notions respecting magic in his book "De verâ et falsâ Magiâ," ("On True and False Magic,") and for condemning the practice of burning those called witches. He wrote other works. Died in 1595.

Lope de Rueda, lo'pà dà roo-ā'dà, a Spanish actor and dramatic author, born at Seville about 1500. He was the leader of the first troupe of strolling players in Spain, and was praised by Cervantes as an actor and writer. His plays were dialogues between a few shepherds. Died in 1564.

Lope de Vega Carpio, lo'pà dà vā'gà kaR'pe-o, (FELIX,) a celebrated Spanish poet and dramatist, born at Madrid on the 25th of November, 1562, was a contemporary of Cervantes and Shakspeare. His father was a hidalgo, (gentleman,) but rather poor. Felix began to write verses in early childhood, and composed dramas about the age of twelve. While a student at the University of Alcalá, he found a powerful patron in the Duke of Alva, whose service he entered, and at whose request he wrote his "Arcadia," a pastoral heroic poem, which first revealed his superior genius. It was first printed in 1598, though finished many years earlier. He quitted the service of Alva, and married Doña Isabel de Urbino. Having in a duel wounded his antagonist, he fled from Madrid, and passed a few years in Valencia.

His grief for the death of his wife is assigned as his motive for becoming a soldier. In 1588 he enlisted as a private volunteer, and, with ardent zeal for what he deemed a holy cause, took part in the expedition of the Invincible Armada, during which he wrote his admired poem the "Beauty of Angelica," ("Hermosura de Angelica,") a continuation of Ariosto's "Orlando." Renouncing martial pursuits in 1590, he returned to Madrid, where he began to write for the stage, and by his marvellous fertility of invention rapidly acquired fame and affluence. He required only a single day to compose a versified drama. This astonishing facility enabled him to produce two thousand original dramas, consisting of spiritual plays, historical comedies, and dramas of intrigue, called De Capa y Espada, ("Of the Cloak and Sword,") which were performed with immense applause. There is scarcely an example on record of an equal popularity. His name became a synonym for the superlative degree, and it was the fashion to say a Lope diamond, a Lope dress, etc., to express the splendour or perfection of those articles. He was styled the "Centre of Fame," the "Darling of Fortune," the "Phœnix of Ages," etc. Among his dramas we may mention "The Beautiful Deformed," ("La Hermosa fea,") "The Prude," ("La Dama melindrosa,") "The Certain for the Doubtful," ("Lo Cierto por lo Dudoso,") and "Estrella de Sevilla," or "Don Sancho Ortiz." In richness of invention, vivacity of dialogue, and variety of ideas he is perhaps unsurpassed by any dramatist. For the sake of trying the public taste, he published, without his name, a poem entitled "Soliloquies on God," which was received with much favour. After the death of his second wife he became a priest, (1609,) but continued to write for the stage. He also wrote epic poems, entitled "Circe," "Andromeda," and "Jerusalem Delivered," which are considered much inferior to his dramas. Died in 1635. (For some very interesting remarks on Lope de Vega, particularly in reference to the marvellous fertility of his genius, see Prescott's "Miscellanies," pp. 137–139.)

Lorenzetti, lo-rên-zet'tee, or Lorenzetto, lo-rên-zet'to, (AMBROGIO,) sometimes called AMBROGIO DI LORENZO, an old Italian painter, born at Sienna about 1260, was a pupil of his father Lorenzo, and was a brother of Pietro. His birth is variously dated about 1257, 1277, and 1300. Ambrogio and Pietro worked together in Sienna, and were among the greatest artists of their time. The works of Ambrogio are nearly all destroyed; but some of his frescos are still visible in Sienna. He was, says Vasari, universally admired. Died in 1340, 1348, or 1360.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.; LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie."

Lorenzetti, (PIETRO,) a brother of the preceding, worked in Sienna, Florence, Rome, and Pisa, and, according to Vasari, surpassed Cimabue and Giotto. In the Campo Santo of Pisa is preserved his picture representing the "Life of the Fathers in the Desert," in fresco. He painted several Madonnas, which have been destroyed. He is sometimes called LAURATI. His last works are dated 1355.

Lorraine, lor-rān' or lo'rȧn', (ANTOINE,) DUKE OF, the son of René II., was born at Bar-le-Duc in 1489. He succeeded his father in 1508, and married Renée de Bourbon, a French lady. He maintained a neutrality in the war between Charles V. and Francis I., and reigned mostly in peace, except some bloody contests with the German Protestants. He died in 1544, leaving the duchy to his son, Francis II.

Lorraine, CARDINAL. See GUISE, (CHARLES DE.)

Lorraine, lo'rȧn', (CHARLES IV.,) DUKE OF, the son of François, Comte de Vaudemont, was born in 1604, and succeeded his uncle Henry (whose daughter he had married) in 1624. Louis XIII. of France invaded Lorraine in 1632, and took without much resistance Nancy (the capital) and several fortresses. In the Thirty Years' war, which began about 1620, Charles fought for the German empire, contributed to the victory over the Swedes at Nordlingen in 1634, and as an ally of Spain fought against the French in several ensuing campaigns. By the treaty of the Pyrenees (1659) Lorraine was restored to him, but France retained the duchy of Bar. In 1662 he appointed Louis XIV. his heir, but soon took arms against him, and became a general in the imperial army. Died in 1675.

Lorraine, (CHARLES V.,) DUKE OF, an able general and statesman, born at Vienna in 1643, was the nephew of the preceding. He was the son of Francis, (a brother of Charles IV.) At the death of Charles IV. the dukedom was claimed by the subject of this article, and by the French king, who had possession; but Charles was recognized as duke by the other powers of Europe. Having entered the Austrian service, he was made a general in 1672, and distinguished himself at Senef in 1675. His reign over Lorraine was only nominal. He was chosen generalissimo of the imperial army in 1676. In 1678 he married a sister of the Austrian emperor, and was restored by the treaty of Nymwegen to his duchy, with the condition of ceding Nancy to France; but he refused to accept these terms. He rendered signal services to Austria in the war against the Turks which began in 1683, and commanded a corps against the French in 1689. He died in 1690, leaving his title to his son, Leopold I.

Lorraine, (HENRI,) DUKE OF, surnamed THE GOOD, born at Nancy in 1563, was the son of Charles III. and Claude, daughter of Henry II. of France. He married Catherine de Bourbon, a sister of King Henry IV., and in 1608 succeeded his father. He died in 1624, leaving the duchy to his nephew, Charles IV.

Lorraine, (LEOPOLD I.,) DUKE OF, born at Innspruck in 1679, was the son of Charles V. By the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697, he recovered Lorraine, with the condition that he should not repair the dismantled forts nor keep an army. He married Elizabeth Charlotte, niece of Louis XIV. He showed himself a wise ruler, and improved the condition of his dominions, which had been desolated by long wars. In reference to him, Voltaire says, "One of the petty sovereigns of Europe has done the most good to his people." He died in 1729, and was succeeded by his son Francis, who married Maria Theresa of Austria, and exchanged Lorraine for Tuscany. He was the last Duke of Lorraine.

Lorraine, (RENÉ II.,) DUKE OF, born in 1451, became duke in 1473. His mother was a daughter of René of Anjou, and heiress of the duchy of Lorraine. His dominions having been invaded by Charles the Bold of Burgundy, René, with his Swiss allies, defeated Charles at Morat in 1476. The next year he gained another famous victory near Nancy, where Charles was killed in battle. He formed an alliance with Venice, and in 1480 was appointed captain-general of that republic; but on the death of Louis XI. of France he left the service of Venice to urge his claims to Anjou and Provence, which he failed to obtain. He died in 1508, leaving two sons, Antoine, who was his heir, and Claude, the first Duke of Guise.

Lorraine, de, dẹh lor-rān′, (CHARLES,) an Austrian general, called PRINCE CHARLES OF LORRAINE, born at Lunéville in 1712, was the second son of Duke Leopold I., and a brother of Francis I. of Austria. He commanded the Austrians in the war between Maria Theresa and Frederick the Great, by whom he was defeated at Czaslau in 1742. In 1744 he forced Frederick to evacuate Bohemia, married a sister of Maria Theresa, and was appointed Governor of the Low Countries. At the beginning of the Seven Years' war he was commander of the Austrians, and gained a victory over the Prussians at Breslau in 1757; but, having been completely defeated in the great battle of Leuthen, in the same year, he resigned his command. Died in 1780.

Lorraine, de, (FRANÇOIS,) grand-prieur of France, was born in 1534, and was a son of the Duke of Guise. After serving with distinction in naval war against the Turks, he was made general of the galleys, and commanded several expeditions. Died in 1563.

Lorris, de, dẹh lo′rèss′, (GUILLAUME,) a mediæval French bard, born at Lorris, on the Loire. He was the author of the "Romance of the Rose," ("Roman de la Rose,") a remarkable poem, which had a great influence on French literature. The subject is the art of love, and is treated in an agreeable style. He is supposed to have died about 1240.

Loth, lot, or Loti, lo′tee, [in Italian, LOTTI,] (JOHANN KARL,) a German painter, born at Munich in 1632. He acquired a high rank among the realists, whom the Italians call "Naturalisti." Among his chief works are "The Death of Abel," and a "Nativity." He received the title of first painter to the emperor Leopold I. Died at Venice in 1698.

Lothaire, lo-thair′, [Fr. pron. lo′târ′; Lat. LOTHA′RIUS; Ger. LOTHAR, lo-târ′; It. LOTARIO, lo-tâ′re-o,] I., Emperor of the West or of Rome, born abou. 795 A.D., was the eldest son of Louis le Débonnaire. His father associated him with himself in the empire in 817, and made him King of Italy in 822. Pepin and Louis, brothers of Lothaire, received respectively Aquitaine and Germany. At the death of his father, in 840, he claimed supremacy as emperor; but his brothers, Louis the Germanic and Charles the Bald, united to dispute his title, and defeated him at the great battle of Fontanet, (now Fontenailles,) in 841. By the treaty of Verdun (843) Lothaire retained Italy, with some provinces of France. His capital was Aix-la-Chapelle. He died in 855 A.D., leaving three sons, Louis, Charles, and Lothaire, among whom the empire was divided.

Lothaire [Lat. LOTHA′RIUS; Ger. LOTHAR] II. or III., Emperor of Germany, sometimes called LOTHAIRE OF SAXONY, was born in 1075. He was the son of Gebhard, Count of Arnsberg. After the death of Henry V. he was elected emperor, in 1125. Conrad, Duke of Franconia, protested against the election, and was crowned at Milan by his partisans. About 1132 Lothaire marched to Rome and restored Pope Innocent II., who had been expelled by his rival Anaclete. He was crowned at Rome by Innocent, and performed acts of homage to the pope which were afterwards cited as an evidence that the empire was a fief of the Roman See. He died in 1137, and Conrad III., above named, became emperor. In the reign of Lothaire the Diet of the empire asserted its exclusive right to impose taxes and make war or peace.

Lothaire, lo-thair′ or lo′târ′, King of France, the son of Louis d'Outremer, was born in 941 A.D., and succeeded his father in 954. His reign was disturbed by contests with powerful vassals, among whom was Hugh Capet, and he waged war with Otho II. of Germany. He died in 986, and was succeeded by his son, Louis V.

Lothaire, King of Italy, was the son of Hugh of Provence, who admitted him to a share of the royal power in 931. He reigned alone a few years, and died in 950, leaving an only child, Emma, who was married to Lothaire of France. His successor was Berenger II.

Lothaire, King of Lorraine, was the second son of the emperor Lothaire I. In 855 he inherited the country situated between the Rhine and the Meuse, which was called Lotharingia,—Gallicé Lorraine. He weakened the royal power by yielding to the encroachments of the clergy, and by other impolitic measures. Died in 869 A.D.

Lo'throp, (HARRIET MULFORD,) an American author, born (Stone) at New Haven, Connecticut; married, 1881, Daniel Lothrop, of the publishing house of D. Lothrop & Co. She founded the National Society of the Children of the American Revolution, and under the name of Margaret Sidney wrote "Five Little Peppers" and other juveniles of the "Peppers" series, and a considerable number of other works.

Loti, (PIERRE,) the pseudonym of Louis Marie Viaud, was born at Rochefort, France, in 1850. He entered the navy, but fell into disgrace by his too truthful letters in "Figaro" on the conduct of the French soldiers at Hué in 1883. He afterwards became an active writer, producing vividly imaginative pictures of nature, which possess an enduring charm. He was admitted to the Academy in 1891. Among his works are "Le Mariage de Loti," (1880,) "Madame Crysanthème," (1887,) "Le Désert," (1894,) and "Ramuntcho," (a Basque story, 1897.)

Lotich, [Lat. LOTICH'IUS,] (PETER,) a celebrated German poet, born at Schluchtern, Hesse-Cassel, in 1528, was called SECUNDUS, to distinguish him from his uncle of the same name. He fought for the Protestant League of Schmalkalden, and afterwards entered the civil service of the Elector-Palatine. He became professor of medicine at Heidelberg in 1557, and died in 1560. He owes his fame to Latin elegies and other poems, (1551,) which were highly praised by eminent critics. "Lotich," says Hallam, "is a very elegant and classical versifier, and perhaps equal in elegy to any Cisalpine writer of the sixteenth century." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Lotti, lot'tee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian composer, born at Venice about 1665; died in 1740.

Lotti, (COSIMO,) a Florentine painter and architect, was noted for mechanical ingenuity, and made several automata at Florence. About 1628 he was invited by Philip IV. to Madrid, where he built the theatre Buen Retiro.

Lotto, lot'to, (LORENZO,) an excellent Italian painter, was born at Venice about 1490. He worked chiefly at Bérgamo, and had the reputation of being one of the best painters of the Venetian school. Among his masterpieces are several Madonnas at Bérgamo. His first works are dated about 1515, and his last about 1560. "His master-pieces," says Lanzi, "place him almost on a level with the first luminaries of the art."

Lotze, lot'sẹh, (RUDOLPH HERMANN,) an eminent German philosopher, born at Bautzen, Saxony, May 21, 1817. He was educated at Zittau and Göttingen, and in 1838 graduated as doctor of philosophy and of medicine. He afterwards lectured on philosophy at Leipsic, and in 1844 was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, where for nearly forty years he lived a laborious and uneventful life. Died at Berlin, July 1, 1881. Among his works are "Metaphysics," (1841,) and "Logic," (1843,) and later works (1874 and 1879) with the same titles, forming parts of his uncompleted "System of Philosophy," "General Pathology and Therapeutics as Mechanical and Natural Sciences," (1842,) "General Physiology of the Organic Life," (1851,) "Medical Psychology, or Physiology of the Soul," (1852,) "History of Æsthetics in Germany," (1868,) etc. But his greatest work is the "Microcosmus," (3 vols., 1856–64.) Lotze is one of the ablest of the recent opponents of materialism. Several of his treatises have been translated into English. Without founding a new school of thought, Lotze exerted, and still exerts, a wide and wholesome intellectual and moral influence; but his usefulness as a teacher has been limited by the frequent obscurity of his diction.

Loubère, de la, dẹh là loo'bair', (ANTOINE,) a French geometer, born in Languedoc in 1600. He taught various sciences in the colleges of the Jesuits, and published several learned mathematical works. Died in 1664.

Loubère, de la, (SIMON,) a nephew of the preceding, was born at Toulouse in 1642. He was sent as envoy to Siam in 1687. After his return he published a work "On the Kingdom of Siam," (1691,) which is praised for fidelity and judicious observations. He was elected to the French Academy in 1693. Died in 1729.

Loubet, loo'bā', (ÉMILE,) a French statesman, born at Marsanne in 1838. He adopted the profession of the law, and engaged in public life as a member of the municipal council of Montélimar. He was elected to the French Chamber in 1876, became a Senator in 1885, and was premier of France during part of 1893. He was later president of the Senate, and on the death of President Faure, February, 1899, was elected President of France.

Loudon, (JOHN CLAUDIUS,) an eminent Scottish writer on horticulture and agriculture, was born at Cambuslang in 1783. Having learned the business of a landscape-gardener, he removed to London in 1803. A few years later he rented a farm, on which he tried new modes of cultivation with success, and soon acquired an easy fortune. After visiting various countries of Europe, he returned to London, and published "The Encyclopædia of Gardening," (1822,) which had a very large sale. He afterwards produced "Encyclopædia of Agriculture," (1825,) and "Encyclopædia of Cottage, Farm, and Villa Architecture," (1832.) The last was especially popular. He was editor of the "Gardener's Magazine," commenced in 1826, and of the "Magazine of Natural History," (1828–36.) His industry and extensive learning were displayed in an expensive work on the trees and shrubs of Britain, entitled "Arboretum et Fruticetum Britannicum," (1838.) Died in 1843.

His wife, née JANE WEBB, born in 1808, wrote a novel called "The Mummy," "The Ladies' Flower Garden," "Botany for Ladies," and other popular works. Died in 1858.

After his return home, in 1838, he exhibited "Ophelia," "Hebe banished," "The Roman Fruit-Girl," a statue of Victoria, (1845,) and a statue of Prince Albert, (1847.) Among his greatest works is a colossal marble group of "Satan subdued by the Archangel Michael," (1851.) Died 1876.

Louis, loo'iss, [It. LUIGI, loo-ee'jee,] I., King of Etruria, born at Parma in 1773, was the son of Ferdinand Duke of Parma. In 1795 he married Maria Louisa, a daughter of Charles IV. of Spain. By a treaty between the Spanish court and Napoleon in 1801, Louis acquired Tuscany in exchange for Parma, and the name of the former was changed to Etruria. He died in 1803, leaving a son, Louis II.

Louis, loo'iss, [Fr. pron. loo'e'; Ger. LUDWIG, lo͝od'-wiG; Lat. LUDOVI'CUS,] the name of many kings of France. Louis I., surnamed LE DÉBONNAIRE and THE PIOUS, [Lat. LUDOVI'CUS PI'US; Ger. LUDWIG DER FROMME,] Emperor of the West, and King of France, the son and successor of Charlemagne, was born at Casseneuil in 778 A.D. Two elder brothers having died before their father, Louis became heir of all the vast dominions of Charlemagne in 814; but his character was too feeble to maintain the integrity of the empire. He had three sons, Lothaire, Pepin, and Louis, whom about 820 he made his colleagues in the government, giving Italy to the first, Aquitaine to the second, and Bavaria to the third. After this division another son, Charles the Bald, was born to him. His sons Lothaire and Pepin revolted in 830, and deposed him. He was compelled to do public penance, and confined in a convent. By the efforts of his sons Louis and Pepin, he was restored to the throne a short time before his death, which occurred in 840.

Louis II., surnamed LE BÈGUE, lẹh bạg, (i.e. "the Stammerer,") King of France, the son of Charles the Bald, was born in 846 A.D. He succeeded his father in 877. He propitiated his turbulent nobles by granting to them many duchies, earldoms, and seignories. He died in 879, leaving three sons, Louis, Carloman, and Charles the Simple.

See MICHELET, "Histoire de France."

Louis III., King of France, born about 863, was the eldest son of Louis II. In 879 the kingdom was divided between Louis and Carloman, the former of whom received for his share Neustria. He gained a victory over the Normans who invaded France, when he died, without issue, in 882 A.D., aged about twenty, and Carloman became sole king of France.

See MICHELET, "Histoire de France."

Louis IV., surnamed D'OUTREMER (do͞otR'maiR') because he had visited England in infancy, was the son of Charles the Simple. He was born in 920 A.D., and crowned king in 936. Among the events of his reign was a war between him and Hugh, the father of Hugh Capet. He died in 954, and was succeeded by his son, Lothaire II.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français."

Louis V., King of France, surnamed LE FAINÉANT, (i.e. "the Idle" or "Do-Nothing,") the son of Lothaire II., was born about 966. He inherited the title of king in 986, and died in 987, without issue, being the last king of the Carlovingian dynasty. Hugh Capet was elected as his successor.

See MICHELET, "Histoire de France."

Louis VI. of France, surnamed LE GROS, (lẹh gRo,) was the son of Philip I. and of Bertha. He was born in 1078, and became king in 1108. Before his accession the royal power had been much reduced by the prevalence of the feudal system, and in his reign many seigneurs asserted by arms the sovereign power over their fiefs. He waged war against Henry I. of England for the possession of Normandy, but was not successful. He is represented as a brave and generous prince, and is honoured for the establishment of communes and municipal governments, by which he promoted the political influence of the third estate. He died in 1137, and was succeeded by his son, Louis VII.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français;" MICHELET, "Histoire de France."

Louis VII., King of France, surnamed LE JEUNE, ("the Young,") born in 1120, was the son of Louis VI., whom he succeeded in 1137. He married Eleanor, heiress of the Duke of Aquitaine. Having been anathematized by the pope, he became penitent, and, in order to expiate his sins, he joined the second crusade to Palestine in 1147, and was followed by a large army of Frenchmen and others. After many defeats and disasters, by which he lost nearly all his men, he returned in 1149. His wife Eleanor, having been divorced in 1152 married Henry II. of England, who by this marriage acquired Guienne and Poitou. War ensued between Louis and Henry, but no decisive advantage was gained by either. He died in 1180, and was succeeded by his son, Philip Augustus.

See MICHELET, "Histoire de France;" MICHAUD, "History of the Crusades;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Louis VIII., surnamed CŒUR-DE-LION, (kuR'dẹh-le'ôN',) the son of Philip Augustus, was born in 1187, and ascended the throne in 1223. His wife was Blanche of Castile. He recovered by arms Poitou and several places which the English held in France. Instigated by the pope, he led a crusade against the Albigenses, and waged an unjust war against the Count of Toulouse, who was denounced as a heretic. At the end of the first campaign he died, in 1226, leaving the throne to his son, Louis IX.

See RYMER, "Fœdera," 1704; VAISSETTE, "Histoire générale du Languedoc," 5 vols., 1730–45.

Louis IX., or Saint Louis, King of France, was born in 1215, and succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226. His mother, Blanche of Castile, was regent during his minority, and defended his throne with wisdom against Thibaut de Champagne and other barons who were leagued with him. Louis married Margaret of Provence in 1234. In 1244 he recovered from a dangerous illness, and made a vow to conduct a crusade against the infidels. Having raised a large army, he departed in 1248, and in the next year entered Egypt. There his army was ravaged by disease, and defeated at Mansourah by the Saracens, who took Saint Louis prisoner. By paying a ransom he obtained his liberty, and pursued his course to Palestine, where he remained about three years. He returned to France in 1254, and employed himself in improving the condition of the people by wise laws. His foreign policy was pacific towards European nations, but his zeal against infidels urged him to another crusade in 1270. He first directed his operations against Tunis, but before he had reached that place he died, near Carthage or Tunis, in August, 1270. He was canonized in 1297. He was succeeded by his son, Philippe le Hardi. "Louis was," says Voltaire, "in all respects a model for men. His piety, which was that of an anchorite, did not deprive him of royal virtues. He made a profound policy agree and concur with exact justice; and perhaps he is the only sovereign who merits this praise."

Louis X., surnamed LE HUTIN, (lẹh hü'tăN',) King of France, the son of Philippe le Bel, was born in 1289, and became king in 1314. He married Clémence, a daughter of the King of Hungary. Among the chief events of his short reign was his unfortunate expedition against Flanders. He died, without male issue, in 1316 and his brother, Philippe le Long, was his successor

Louis XI., King of France, born at Bourges in 1423, was the son of Charles VII. He married Charlotte, a daughter of the Duke of Savoy. His ambitious and unscrupulous character was early manifested by revolts against his father. He became king in 1461, soon after which the Duke of Burgundy and other nobles formed against him the "League of the Public Good." Besieged in his capital by the army of this league in 1465, he induced them to retire and disband by the large concessions of a treaty which he intended to violate at his own convenience. By crafty policy, superior abilities, and vigorous measures, he greatly increased the royal power at the expense of the nobles, many of whom fell victims to his cruelty. His inveterate enemy, Charles the Bold of Burgundy, having been killed in battle at Nancy in 1477, Louis availed himself of the occasion to seize his large domains, but was resisted with partial success by Maximilian of Austria in a war of several years. Louis had made peace with Edward IV. of England in 1475. He died in 1483, leaving the throne to his son, Charles VIII. The reign of Louis XI. is remarkable for the multitude of important events, and for the complete revolution which the monarchy then passed through. Post-offices were first established by him in France.

Louis XII. of France, born at Blois in 1462, was the son of Charles, Duke of Orléans, and Marie of Cleves. At the accession of Charles VIII. (1483) he was the first prince of the blood. Before that date he had been compelled to marry Jeanne, the daughter of Louis XI. In 1495 he attended his cousin, Charles VIII., in his expedition against Naples, and in 1498 became the successor of that king, who left no issue. He married Anne de Bretagne, the widow of the late king, thus securing the province of Bretagne for the crown. His army conquered the duchy of Milan, and brought Duke Francis Sforza a captive to France in 1500. He resolved, also, to prosecute the claims of his family to Naples, then ruled by Frederick of Aragon. In 1501 Louis and Ferdinand of Spain agreed to partition between themselves the kingdom of Frederick, who, finding resistance impossible, retired to France and received a pension from Louis. The quarrel that ensued between Louis and Ferdinand ended in 1503 by the expulsion of the French from Naples by Gonsalvo de Córdova. The pope, Julius II., having formed a league against Louis, the French were defeated at Novara in 1513 and driven out of Italy. At the age of fifty-three he married Mary, a sister of Henry VIII. of England. He died on the 1st of January, 1515, leaving two daughters, Claude and Renée. He was succeeded by Francis I. Louis XII. gained the affection of his subjects by reducing the taxes and promoting justice, and received the surname of "Father of the People."

Louis XIII. of France, the son of Henry IV. and of Marie de Médicis, was born at Fontainebleau on the 27th of September, 1601. He succeeded his father May 14, 1610, under the regency of his mother, was declared of age in 1614, and married Anne of Austria, a daughter of Philip III. of Spain, in 1615. Soon after that date Marie de Médicis was exiled from court, and the Duke de Luynes became the royal favourite. In 1620 Louis marched against his Protestant subjects, who had been provoked into a revolt. During the progress of this war Richelieu obtained the favour and confidence of the king, who made him prime minister in 1624. As Louis was very deficient in political ability, Richelieu was the master-spirit of the government from that time until his death. Among the memorable events of this reign was the capture of Rochelle from the Protestants, (1628,) after a siege of about a year. The great talents and policy of Richelieu were directed with success to the subjection of the Huguenots, the establishment of absolutism in France, and the abatement of the overgrown power of Austria. During the Thirty Years' war the French armies obtained frequent successes against the Spaniards and Imperialists, and extended the boundaries of France by the conquest of Roussillon, Alsace, and the duchy of Bar. Louis died in May, 1643, leaving the crown to his son, Louis XIV. His character was timid, and not adapted to win the favour or admiration of the French. He is said, however, to have given proof of personal courage in several battles.

Louis XIV., surnamed LE GRAND, (leh grŏN,) or "the Great," often called even by English speakers LOUIS QUATORZE, (loo'e' kă'torz',) the eldest son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria, was born on the 16th of September, 1638. At the age of five he ascended the throne, in 1643, under the regency of his mother, who was a daughter of Philip III. of Spain. During his minority the government was directed by Cardinal MAZARIN, (which see,) a foreigner, whose ministry was very unpopular, and who was involved in a civil war, against a faction called La Fronde, from 1648 until 1653. In 1649 Louis and his mother were driven out of the capital by the Frondeurs, of whom Condé was the chief. The Thirty Years' war was ended in 1648 by the peace of Westphalia, on terms favourable to France; but Spain, refusing to unite in this treaty, continued the war against the French until the treaty of the Pyrenees, (1659,) when Louis married Maria Theresa, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain.

At the death of Mazarin, in 1661, Louis resolved to be his own prime minister, and was fortunate in obtaining the services of so able a financier as Colbert. France was then without doubt the greatest and most compact power in Europe. To the arduous duties of his new position the king brought imposing and popular personal qualities, and political talents of a high order. His ambition was to make France prosperous and the monarchy absolute. His policy was briefly summed up in his famous saying, "L'État, c'est moi!" ("The State—that is myself!") The death of Philip IV. of Spain, in 1665, furnished him a pretext for the extension of his dominions towards the Rhine. In exchange for the dowry promised to his queen, which the Spanish court neglected to pay, he claimed Flanders and Franche-Comté, which he invaded with success in 1667. The emperor Leopold and the Dutch aided the Spaniards against him until the treaty of Nymwegen, (1678,) by which Louis retained Franche-Comté and a large part of Flanders. In the mean time the administration had been reformed and centralized by Louis, and the taxes had been reduced and the revenue increased by Colbert. In 1670 Louis made a secret treaty with Charles II. of England, whose alliance he purchased by a pension. Commerce, manufactures, arts, literature, etc. were liberally encouraged in his reign; but the intolerant zeal of the king betrayed him into one very unjust and impolitic measure when, in 1685, he revoked the edict of Nantes, which had secured the religious liberty of Protestants. His Catholic zeal, however, did not deter him from a serious quarrel with the pope, on the question of franchises, in 1687. About this time he secretly married Madame de Maintenon, a lady of obscure origin but eminent merit. (See MAINTENON.)

A second general war broke out in 1688, between Louis on one side, and Spain, Austria, England, and the Prince of Orange on the other. Louis failed in his attempt to restore James II. of England, and found a formidable adversary in James's successor, William III. After many sieges and indecisive actions in Flanders, the war was suspended by the treaty of Ryswick, (1697.) By the will of Charles II. of Spain, (1700,) Philip, Duke of Anjou, a grandson of Louis XIV., was appointed heir to the Spanish throne. This occasioned a great European coalition against the French king, and the long war of the Spanish succession, in which he had to contend against the English and Austrians, under Marlborough and Eugene, who won great victories at Blenheim, Malplaquet, etc.; but the French prince Philip remained master of Spain, and hostilities were ended by the treaty of Utrecht, in April, 1713. After a reign of seventy-two years, he died, on the 1st of September, 1715, and was succeeded by his great-grandson, Louis XV. The age of Louis XIV. was the most brilliant in the literary history of France, and he was a very judicious as well as a very munificent patron of literary merit. He preserved his equanimity in his successes and his reverses.

"No sovereign," says Macaulay, in his review of Dumont's "Recollections of Mirabeau," "has ever represented the majesty of a great state with more dignity and grace. . . . He was not a great general; he was not a great statesman; but he was, in one sense of the words, a great king. Never was there so consummate a master of what our James I. would have called king-craft. Though his internal administration was bad, though the military triumphs of his reign were not achieved by himself, though his later years were crowded with defeats, . . . he succeeded in passing himself off on his people as a being above humanity."

Louis XV. of France, the great-grandson of Louis XIV., was born at Fontainebleau the 15th of February, 1710. His father was the virtuous Duke of Burgundy, and his mother was Maria Adelaide of Savoy. Louis became king on the 1st of September, 1715, the Duke of Orléans, a nephew of Louis XIV., being then appointed regent. The minority of Louis was a period of scandalous corruption in morals and politics. Among the ruinous errors of the regent's administration was his adoption of the financial system of the famous projector Law. (See LAW, JOHN.) In 1723 the king was declared of age, the Duke of Orléans died, and the Duke of Bourbon became prime minister. In 1725 Louis married Marie Leczinska, daughter of Stanislas, the dethroned king of Poland, and in the next year Bourbon was superseded by the eminent statesman Cardinal Fleury, who had been preceptor of the young king and had merited his confidence. By his prudent and pacific administration Fleury restored some degree of order and prosperity in the state, and arrested the downward progress of the monarchy. A war which began between the French and Austrians in 1733 was waged on the Rhine and in Italy until 1735, when Lorraine was ceded to France by the treaty of Vienna. Against the advice of Fleury, Louis joined in 1741 the iniquitous coalition against Maria Theresa of Austria, and sent an army into Bohemia. The English then declared war against France. In 1743 Cardinal Fleury died, and Louis resolved to dispense with a prime minister. Among the principal events of this war was the battle of Fontenoy, (1745,) where in presence of Louis his army defeated the English under the Duke of Cumberland. Hostilities were suspended by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. About this period Louis ceased to take an active part in the government, and abandoned himself to scandalous vices in the harem called the "Parc aux Cerfs."

Rival claims of the French and English in Canada were the cause or pretext of a war which began in 1755, and the French court was at the same time involved in the Seven Years' war as the ally of Maria Theresa. The disasters and disgraces of this war increased the unpopularity of the king, who was stabbed by a fanatic named Damiens in 1757, but only slightly hurt. The French were defeated by Frederick the Great at Rossbach (1757) and at Minden, (1759,) and in various naval battles by the English. After losing Canada and other colonies, the French court signed the treaty of Paris in 1763, and ended a war the odium of which was thrown on Madame de Pompadour. Under the auspices of the Duc de Choiseul, then chief minister, the order of the Jesuits was suppressed about 1762. Louis died in May, 1774, leaving the kingdom impoverished, oppressed, and demoralized. He was succeeded by his grandson, Louis XVI., whose father, the dauphin, had died in 1765.

CAPEFIGUE, "Louis XV et la Société du XVIIIe Siècle;" CARLYLE, "French Revolution."

Louis XVI., the grandson of Louis XV., was born at Versailles, August 23, 1754. He was the second son of Louis, Dauphin of France, and Marie Josèphe of Saxony, and received at his birth the title of Duc de Berry. In 1770 he married Marie Antoinette, a daughter of Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria. He ascended the throne in 1774, and appointed Turgot minister of the finances, which were then in great disorder. Turgot, a man of probity and ability, undertook wise and extensive reforms; but these were resisted by the nobility and clergy, and he was dismissed from office in 1776. Necker then became contrôleur-général, or prime minister. (See NECKER, J.) In 1778 the French court recognized the independence of the United States, declared war against England, and sent a fleet and army to fight for the new republic. Peace was restored between France and England in 1783, and the French soldiers returned home enthusiasts for liberty.

Necker having resigned in 1781, Calonne was appointed contrôleur-général. He not only failed to supply the deficit in the revenue, but increased the public distress by his prodigality, and called an Assembly of Notables in 1787. In this year Calonne was superseded by Loménie de Brienne, who also was found incompetent to guide the state through that great financial and political crisis, and advised the king to convoke the States-General, which had not been assembled since 1614. Louis recalled Necker to the place of prime minister about September 1, 1788, and convoked the States-General at Versailles in May, 1789. This event was the signal for the explosion of passions, ambitions, and resentments which had accumulated and fermented during a long period of misrule. The popular cause derived great advantage from Necker's ordinance that the number of the deputies of the Third Estate should be equal to the sum of all the noblesse and clergy. After a contest between the Third Estate and the other orders on the question whether they should vote together or separately by orders, the Third Estate prevailed, and took the name of the National Constituent Assembly. Necker having been dismissed in July, 1789, the populace of Paris destroyed the Bastille a few days later. Thenceforth the progress of revolution was rapid and irresistible. The Assembly made a great and sudden change in the political and social condition of France by the abolition of tithes, titles of nobility, feudal privileges, and inveterate abuses. The landed estates of the Church, comprising nearly one-third of France, were confiscated. The king, who was disposed to make large concessions and lacked firmness to resist popular aggressions, remained as a hostage of the old régime in the hands of the nation. The position of Louis became so irksome and perilous that he attempted, in June, 1791, to escape with his family from Paris, but was arrested at Varennes and compelled to return. He then accepted the new constitution, which proclaimed liberty, equality, and universal suffrage. In March, 1792, a Girondist ministry was formed, in which Dumouriez and Roland were the chief ministers, and war was declared against Austria and Prussia. By the insurrection of August 10, the Jacobins, led by Danton and Robespierre, effected the total subversion of the monarchy and initiated the reign of terror. Louis was confined in a prison called the Temple, after being subjected to indignities and outrages from the mob He was tried for treason by the National Convention, which met in September, 1792, defended by Desèze and Tronchet, and condemned to death, the vote being 387 for death and 334 for banishment or detention. He was executed January 21, 1793, and died with tranquil fortitude. He left a son, Louis, styled the Seventeenth, and a daughter, Elizabeth. His virtues were better adapted to a private station than to a throne.

Louis XVII. of France, the second son of Louis XVI., was born in 1785. He became dauphin at the death of an elder brother in 1789, and was recognized as king in January, 1793, by the French royalists and several foreign courts, but was closely confined by the Jacobins. The cruel treatment which he received from his jailers hastened his death, which occurred in prison in June, 1795.

See A. DE BEAUCHESNE, "Life, Sufferings, and Death of Louis XVII.," translated by W. HAZLITT.

Louis XVIII. of France, born at Versailles in November, 1755, was the third son of the dauphin, and younger brother of Louis XVI. He received at his birth the names of Louis Stanislas Xavier, and the title of Count de Provence. He was also styled MONSIEUR during the reign of Louis XVI. In 1771 he married Marie Joséphine de Savoy. He favoured the Revolution in its first stages, and by his influence determined that the Third Estate should send to the States-General as many deputies as both of the other orders. He remained in Paris until the flight of the king to Varennes, in June, 1791, when he escaped by another route. During the republic and empire he resided at Verona, Mitau, Warsaw, and Hartwell, England. In April, 1814, he returned to France and ascended the throne vacated by Bonaparte. He hastened to accept a constitutional charter which his ministers presented. By the escape of Napoleon, his daring march to Paris, and the defection of the army, Louis was forced to fly on the 20th of March, 1815, and retired to Ghent. (See BONAPARTE.)

He was again restored by the allied armies in July, 1815, at one of the most disastrous epochs in French history. "The king must have had," says Lamartine, "great courage or a great thirst of power, to accept a throne and a nation buried under so many ruins." Louis dismissed Talleyrand, and selected for prime minister the Duc de Richelieu; but M. Decazes, minister of police, was his chief favourite. The majority of the Chamber of Deputies were extreme royalists, and maintained an opposition to the ministry. Several Bonapartists were executed, and others banished. On September 5, 1816, the king dissolved the Chamber, and by this coup d'état gained much popularity. The next elections resulted in favour of the moderate royalists. In December, 1818, a new liberal ministry was formed, and Decazes became prime minister. (See DECAZES.) The ultra-royalists, with Villèle as premier, came into power in February, 1820, and passed an electoral law less favourable to the liberal party. In 1823 the French court sent an army into Spain, and supported the cause of absolutism, as an ally of Ferdinand VII. Louis died in September, 1824, without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles X. "His qualities," says Michaud, "were rather brilliant than solid." He had respectable literary attainments and an easy elocution. He is reputed the author of the saying, "Punctuality (exactitude) is the politeness of kings."

Louis [It. LUIGI, loo-ee'jee] II., King and Emperor of Italy, the son of Lothaire I., was born about 822 A.D. He became the colleague of his father in 850, and at the death of the latter, in 855, inherited the throne of Italy. Among the events of his reign were battles which he fought with various success against the Saracens who invaded Italy. He died in 875, leaving a daughter Ermengarde, who was married to Boson, King of Arles. They had a son, who was styled Louis III.

See MURATORI, "Annali d'Italia;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Louis (Luigi) III., King or Emperor of Italy, surnamed THE BLIND, born about 879, was a grandson of the preceding. He was a son of Boson, King of Arles and Ermengarde. In 900 he was invited to Italy by several barons, and was crowned in place of Berenger, who took Louis prisoner in 905 and put out his eyes. Died in 929.

Louis (Luigi) OF TARENTUM, King of Naples, born in 1320, was a grandson of Charles the Lame. He was a cousin of Queen Joan of Naples, who married Louis in 1346, after she had strangled her husband Andrew. Died in 1362.

Louis (Luigi) II., King of Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem, born in 1377, was a son of Louis I. He was crowned by the pope in 1389, and obtained possession of Naples, from which he was expelled by Ladislaus in 1399. Died in 1417.

Louis (Luigi) III., of Naples, Duke of Anjou, born in 1403, was a son of the preceding. He inherited his father's title to the throne of Naples, which, however, was occupied by Alfonso of Aragon. He invaded Italy, and conquered a large part of the kingdom, but died in 1434, before his enterprise was finished.

Louis [Port. LUIS, loo-èss'] I., King of Portugal, born in 1838, began to reign at the death of his brother, Pedro V., in November, 1861, before which he was the Duke of Oporto. He married Maria Pia, a daughter of Victor Emmanuel of Italy, in 1862. Died Oct. 19, 1889.

Louis (Luigi) I., King of Sicily or of Naples, Count of Provence, Duke of Anjou, etc., born in 1339, was a younger son of Jean II. of France. At the instigation of Pope Clement VII., Queen Joan of Naples adopted Louis as her successor in 1380, but his title was disputed by Charles of Durazzo, who afterwards became King of Naples. Died near Bari in 1384.

Louis [Sp. LUIS, loo-èss'] OF ARAGON, King of Sicily, born in 1338, was the eldest son of Peter II., whom he succeeded in 1342. Died in 1355.

Louis, Dauphin of France, the son of Louis XIV. and Maria Theresa, was born in 1661, and was called MONSEIGNEUR. His education was directed by Bossuet, who wrote for him his "Discourse on Universal History." The dauphin, however, had a great aversion to study, and appears to have had only moderate abilities. He married Marie Christine of Bavaria, and became father of the Duke of Burgundy and of the Duke of Anjou, who was afterwards Philip V. of Spain. In 1688 Louis XIV. placed him at the head of the army of the Rhine, under the direction of Vauban. As commander of the army in Flanders in 1694, the dauphin received credit for a march which protected Dunkirk. His last years were passed in compulsory idleness. Died in 1711.

Louis, Dauphin of France, the son of Louis XV., was born in 1729. His virtues, talents, and attainments are highly commended by M. Michaud, Jr. In 1747 he married Marie Josèphe of Saxony, by whom he had three sons, who became kings, viz., Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X. He was excluded by his father from all participation in the government. Died in 1765.

Louis, loo'e', (ANTOINE,) a celebrated French surgeon, born at Metz in 1723. He settled in Paris at an early age, and acquired a high reputation by his writings on surgery. He wrote many able surgical articles for the "Encyclopédie." He was for many years the oracle and counsel of the tribunals in questions of medical jurisprudence. Died in 1792.

Louis, (LOUIS DOMINIQUE,) BARON, a successful French financier, better known as ABBÉ LOUIS, was born at Toul in 1755. He emigrated to England in 1792, and returned about the end of 1799. During the empire he became administrator of the treasury, councillor of state, and a baron. From April, 1814, until August, 1815, he served Louis XVIII. as minister of finance. He was recalled to the same office in 1818 by Decazes, and resigned in November, 1819. He was also appointed minister of finance by Louis Philippe in 1830. Died in 1837.

Louis, (PIERRE CHARLES ALEXANDRE,) a French physician, born at Ai (Marne) in 1787. Among his works is "Researches on Typhoid Fever," (2 vols., 1828.) Died at Paris, August 24, 1872.

Louis Napoleon. See NAPOLEON III.

Louis Philippe, loo'e' fe'lèp', Duke of Orléans, King of the French, often called "the Citizen King," was born in Paris on the 6th of October, 1773, and was the eldest son of Louis Philippe Joseph, Duke of Orléans, who was styled Philippe Égalité. His mother was Louise Marie de Bourbon, a daughter of the Duc de Penthièvre. His early education was directed by Madame de Genlis, who taught him liberal principles and formed him to habits of prudence and self-control. During the life of his father, who was executed in 1793, he was styled the Duke of Chartres. About 1790 he entered the army as colonel, and merited two civic crowns by saving the lives of two priests in an émeute. He favoured the popular cause in the Revolution, and served in the first campaign against the Austrians in 1792. In November of that year he commanded the centre at Jemmapes, and was, says Lamartine, the favourite lieutenant of Dumouriez, the general-in-chief. Having been summoned to appear at the tribunal of the committee of public safety in April, 1793, he escaped across the Belgian frontier with Dumouriez, in whose conspiracy with the Austrians he was implicated. He afterwards wandered as an exile and in disguise through various countries and strange vicissitudes, and was for some months (1794) professor in the College of Reichenau, under the name of M. Chambaud. In 1796 he came for greater safety to the United States, where he travelled more than a year. From 1800 until 1808 the Duke of Orléans resided in England. He married Maria Amelia, daughter of Ferdinand, King of Naples, in 1809. At the restoration of the Bourbons (1814) he returned to France, and was reinstated in his hereditary honours and possessions. When the escape of Bonaparte from Elba became known at Paris, Louis XVIII. appointed the Duke of Orléans commander of the army of the North; but he soon resigned this place. He took little part in public affairs until the revolution of July, 1830, had dethroned Charles X., and a provisional government was formed, under the direction of La Fayette, Lafitte, Guizot, Thiers, and others. A powerful party then urged the claim of Louis Philippe to the throne, while others wished a republic. The scale appears to have been turned by La Fayette, (who did not consider France yet prepared for a republic,) and the crown was offered to the Duke of Orléans by the Deputies and Peers, on the 9th of August, and accepted, with a remodelled constitution. The king called into his cabinet the Duc de Broglie, Count Molé, M. Guizot, and Lafitte. He was soon after recognized by the great powers of Europe. In October, 1830, M. Lafitte became premier, and in March, 1831, was superseded by Casimir Périer. The first part of this reign was disturbed by riots and conspiracies of the Carlists and republicans, and several attempts were made to assassinate the king. In October, 1832, a new ministry was formed, of which Marshal Soult was premier and Guizot and Thiers were members, the majority being Doctrinaires. Frequent changes of the ministry afterwards occurred, by which Count Molé, the Duc de Broglie, Thiers, and Guizot were successively raised to the office of prime minister. In October, 1836, Louis Napoleon made at Strasbourg an abortive attempt to dethrone Louis Philippe, for which he was banished to the United States. Louis Philippe followed a pacific policy, and waged no wars against the great European powers; but his army made important conquests in Algeria. His reign, however, though successful, was not generally popular. It was stigmatized as reactionary, temporizing, "egotistical." The peace which had been the chief merit of this reign was at last imperilled by the impolitic marriage of the king's son, the Duke of Montpensier, to the eventual heiress of the Spanish crown. Electoral reform became the rallying-cry of a plan of agitation concerted by a coalition of republicans, Bonapartists, and royalists in 1847. The forcible opposition of the ministry to this open agitation at reform banquets caused a collision between the troops and the Parisian populace on February 24, 1848. Unwilling to authorize a great slaughter of the people, the king then abdicated in favour of his grandson, Count of Paris; but the republic proclaimed by Lamartine, Arago, and others prevailed. Louis Philippe escaped in disguise to England, where he was kindly received. He died at Claremont, England, in August, 1850, leaving four sons, styled the Duc de Nemours, the Duc de Montpensier, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duc d'Aumale.

Louise de Lorraine, loo'ĕz' dẹh lo'rạn', Queen of France, born in 1554, was the daughter of Nicolas, Count de Vaudemont. In 1575 she was married to Henry III., who treated her with neglect. Died in 1601.

Louise de Savoie, loo'ĕz' dẹh sȧ'vwȧ', Regent of France, born at Pont d'Ain in 1476, was the daughter of Philip, Duke of Savoy. She married Charles of Orléans, and had a son who became king as Francis I. On his departure to Italy, in 1515, he appointed her regent of the kingdom. She caused the loss of the Milanese by appropriating to herself the money destined to pay the troops, and by her unjust treatment provoked Constable Bourbon to join the enemy. She obtained the regency again in 1524, and retained it during the captivity of the king. In 1529 she negotiated with Margaret of Austria the treaty of Cambray between Francis I. and Charles V. Died in 1532.

Louise (or Luise) Ulrike, loo-ee'zẹh ŏŏl're-kẹh, Queen of Sweden, born at Berlin in 1720, was a sister of Frederick the Great of Prussia. She became acquainted with Voltaire, who wrote verses in praise of her agreeable qualities. In 1744 she was married to Prince Adolphus Frederick, who became king in 1751. She founded an Academy of Belles-Lettres at Stockholm in 1753. Died in 1782. Gustavus III. was her son.

Loup, loo, [Lat. SERVA'TUS LU'PUS,] Abbé of Ferrières, is regarded as the most polished writer that France produced in the ninth century. He was born in the diocese of Sens in 805. He was employed by Charles the Bald in important missions, and corresponded with the most eminent men of his time, including several kings. His letters are prized for the light they throw on the events of that period.

Louptière, de la, dẹh lȧ loo'te-aiR', (JEAN CHARLES DE Relongue—rẹh-loNG',) a French poet, born in the diocese of Sens in 1727; died in 1784.

Lourdoueix, loor'doo'ạ', (SOPHIE TESSIER,) a French writer of fiction, born in Paris in 1793. She married M. Lourdoueix, an editor of the "Gazette de France." Among her works is "The Son of his Works," ("Le Fils de ses Œuvres," 2 vols., 1845.) Died in 1859.

Loureiro, de, dȧ lō-rā'e-ro, (JOÃO,) a Portuguese botanist, born about 1715. He practised medicine many years in Cochin China and China, and returned to Portugal after an absence of thirty-six years. His "Flora of Cochin China" (1790) described many new genera, and was esteemed a valuable contribution to botanical science. Died in 1796.

Loutherbourg, loo'tẽR'boor', or Lutherburg, loo'tẽR-bŏŏRG', (PHILIPPE JACQUES,) a skilful French landscape-painter, born at Strasburg about 1735, was a pupil of Casanova. After working some years in Paris, he removed in 1771 to London, where he painted decorations for the Opera. He excelled in landscapes, battle pieces, and views on the sea-coast. His execution is remarkable for facility and vigour. He etched some of his own designs. He died in London about 1812.

Louvard, loo'vȧR', (FRANÇOIS,) a French Jansenist and polemical writer, born in Maine in 1661; died in 1739.

Louvel, loo'vĕl', (PIERRE LOUIS,) a French assassin, born at Versailles in 1783, was a saddler by trade. Prompted by party spirit and enmity to the Bourbons, he assassinated the Duc de Berry, February 13, 1820. This act caused great political excitement, and led to the resignation of the prime minister Decazes. Louvel was executed in June, 1820.

Louverture. See TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE.

Louvet, loo'vā', (PIERRE,) a mediocre French historian, born at Beauvais in 1617. He wrote histories of Languedoc, Aquitaine, and Provence. Died about 1680.

Louvet, (PIERRE,) a French antiquary, born near Beauvais about 1570; died in 1646.

Louvet de Couvray, loo'vā' dẹh koo'vrā', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French Girondist orator, born in Paris in 1760. He was elected to the Convention in 1792, and became a prominent member of the Girondist party. In October, 1792, he attacked Marat and Robespierre in a bold and effective speech. He was proscribed with the Girondist chiefs about June 1, 1793, but escaped by flight to Normandy. In April, 1794, he entered Paris, where he concealed himself until the fall of Robespierre. In 1795 he resumed his seat in the Convention, from which he passed into the Council of Five Hundred. He produced several successful romances, comedies, and political tracts. Died in 1797. In reference to the above-named speech, which is inserted in his "History of the Girondists," Lamartine says, "Louvet was one of those men whose political destiny is composed of a single day; but this day conquers futurity for them, because it associates with their name the memory of a sublime talent and a sublime courage."

See LAMARTINE, "History of the Girondists;" THIERS, "History of the French Revolution;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Louviers, de, dẹh loo've-ā', (CHARLES JACQUES,) a French writer, was appointed a member of the council of state by Charles V. in 1376. He is supposed to be the author of the famous "Dream of the Orchardist," ("Songe du Vergier,") the aim of which is to prove that the pope has no temporal power over princes. The book is in the form of a dialogue.

Louville, de, dẹh loo'vēl', (CHARLES AUGUSTE d'Allonville—dă'lôn'vēl',) MARQUIS, a French diplomatist, born in 1668. In 1701 he was chosen gentleman of the chamber to Philip V. of Spain, who afterwards employed him in missions to Paris and Rome. Died in 1731.

Louville, de, (JACQUES EUGÈNE d'Allonville,) CHEVALIER, a French astronomer, born in the Chartrain in 1671, was a brother of the preceding. He devoted himself to astronomy, and erected an observatory near Orléans. Having been admitted into the Academy of Sciences, he contributed to it "New Tables of the Sun," "Observations on the Obliquity of the Ecliptic," etc. Died in 1732.

See FONTENELLE, "Éloge de M. Louville."

Louvois, de, dẹh loo'vwâ', (CAMILLE LETELLIER,) ABBÉ, born in Paris in 1675, was a son of the celebrated minister of war. He was included by Baillet among the "enfants célèbres," and was elected to the French Academy in 1706. He added 30,000 books to the Royal Library. Died in 1718.

Louvois, de, CHEVALIER. See ESTRÉES, D', (LOUIS CÉSAR LETELLIER.)

Louvois, de, (FRANÇOIS MICHEL LETELLIER,) MARQUIS, a powerful French minister of state, born in Paris in 1641, was a son of Michel Letellier, chancellor of France. In 1654 his father, who was then secretary of war, obtained the reversion of that office for Louvois, who, having qualified himself by diligent studies and gained the favour of the king, became sole minister of war in 1666. While Colbert managed the finances and increased the resources of France, Louvois contributed greatly to the military successes of Louis XIV. He supplanted Colbert in the favour of the king, and instigated Louis to persecute the Protestants. By the counsels of this unscrupulous and haughty minister, who was then extremely powerful, the edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685, and the Palatinate was wasted by fire and sword in 1689. The atrocity of the latter measure excited general horror. His insolence at last exhausted the patience of the king. In 1691 Louvois excited the anger of Louis by proposing to burn Treves, and would have been dismissed if he had not died suddenly in the same year. He is censured for having caused the derangement of the finances, and for fomenting the aggressive martial ambition of his master. "He was the greatest adjutant-general, the greatest quartermaster-general, the greatest commissary-general," says Macaulay, "that Europe had seen. He may, indeed, be said to have made a revolution in the art of disciplining, distributing, equipping, and provisioning armies." His son, the Marquis of Barbesieux, was his successor as minister of war.

Louvrex, de, dẹh loo'vrā', (MATHIAS GUILLAUME,) a Belgian jurist and historian, born at Liege in 1665; died in 1734.

Lovat, lŭv'ạt, (SIMON Fraser,) LORD, a Scottish Jacobite conspirator, born near Inverness about 1676. At the death of Lord Lovat, who was chief of the Fraser clan, Simon Fraser made unsuccessful attempts to obtain the title and estates. To evade the penalty of some crime, he passed over to France about 1700, and turned a Roman Catholic. Having entered the service of the Pretender, he was sent to Scotland in 1702 to incite the Highlanders to rebellion; but he betrayed his trust, and acted the part of informer against the Jacobites. For this offence he was confined in the Bastille several years. In 1715 Fraser fought against the cause of the Stuarts at Inverness, and was rewarded with the estates of the Frasers and the title of Lord Lovat. In the rebellion of 1745 he was detected in treasonable acts against King George, for which he was executed in London in 1747.

Love, (ALFRED HENRY,) an American reformer, born at Philadelphia in 1830. He became a merchant in that city, organized the American Literary Union in 1845 and became its president, was vice-president of the Pennsylvania Prison Society, and one of the founders, in 1866, of the Universal Peace Union, of which he became and remained the president. He edited in the interest of this society the "Voice of Peace" and the "Peacemaker and Court of Arbitration."

Love, lŭv, (CHRISTOPHER,) a Presbyterian theologian, was born at Cardiff, Wales, in 1618. He began to preach in London in 1644, after which he was a member of the Assembly of Divines. After the death of Charles I., he entered into a conspiracy called Love's Plot, the design of which was to restore Charles II. For this cause he was executed in August, 1651. His Sermons, and other works, were published in three volumes.

Love, (JAMES,) the assumed name of a dramatist and actor, who was a son of Mr. Dance, a London architect. A satire against Walpole having appeared under the title "Are these Things so?" he wrote an answer, entitled "Yes, they are: What then?" for which Walpole gave him a present. He acted at Drury Lane from 1762 until his death, and wrote "Pamela," and other comedies. Died in 1774.

Loveira. See LOBEIRA.

Love'joy, (lŭv'joi,) (ELIJAH P.,) an American clergyman and opponent of slavery, born at Albion, in Maine, in 1802, graduated at Waterville in 1826. He began to edit at Alton, Illinois, about 1836, an anti-slavery paper, called "The Alton Observer." His press was twice destroyed by a pro-slavery mob. While defending his premises at Alton against a third attack, he was shot and mortally wounded, in November, 1837.

Lovejoy, (OWEN,) a brother of the preceding, was born at Albion, Kennebec county, Maine, in 1811. He was employed as minister of a Congregational church at Princeton, Illinois, from 1838 to 1854, and was elected a member of Congress by the Republicans of the third district of Illinois in 1856. He was re-elected in 1858, 1860, and 1862. He was a radical opponent of slavery. Died at Brooklyn, New York, in March, 1864.

Lovelace, (RICHARD,) an English poet, born in Kent in 1618. He fought for the king in the civil war, and rose to the rank of captain. Having spent his fortune in the royal cause, he entered the French service in 1646. On his return to England in 1648, he was imprisoned for political reasons. In 1649 he was released, and published a volume of poems, consisting of odes, sonnets, etc., addressed to "Lucasta." Some of these are admired for grace and vigour. He died poor in 1658.

Lovell, lŭv'ęl, (MANSFIELD,) an American general, born at Washington, District of Columbia, October 20, 1822, graduated at West Point in 1842. In the civil war he commanded the Confederate army at New Orleans before the capture of that city. Died in 1884.

Lo'ven, (SVEN,) a Swedish naturalist, born at Stockholm in 1809. He studied the marine fauna of the coasts of the North and Baltic Seas, and was a professor in the Museum of Natural History at Stockholm. He published numerous scientific memoirs, one of the latest being "Echinoconidæ," (1888.) Died September 4, 1895.

Lover, lŭv'ęr, (SAMUEL,) an Irish novelist, poet, and painter, born in Dublin in 1797. He acquired in his youth a good reputation as a portrait-painter, and afterwards became a successful author. Besides numerous ballads and dramas, he produced "Legends and Stories of Ireland," and a novel entitled "Handy Andy," (1842,) and "Rory O'Moore," a song. Among his later publications is "Metrical Tales, and other Poems," (1859.) Died in July, 1868.

Lovering, lŭv'ęr-ing, (JOSEPH,) born in Charlestown, Massachusetts, December 25, 1813, graduated at Harvard College in 1833, and in 1838 was made professor of mathematics and natural philosophy there. He published a great number of scientific memoirs, etc. Died in 1892.

Lov'i-bond, (EDWARD,) an English poet, was born in Middlesex, and inherited an easy fortune. He contributed several essays to "The World," a popular periodical, and was the author of various poems, among which "The Tears of Old May-Day" (1754) is highly praised. Died in 1775.

Lovini. See LUINI.

Lōw, (CHARLES RATHBORNE,) a British writer, born at Dublin in 1837. His works deal largely with military and naval history and biography.

Low, (GEORGE,) a Scottish naturalist, born in Forfarshire in 1746. He wrote "Fauna Orcadensis," (1813,) which treats of the animals of the Orkney and Shetland Isles. Died in 1795.

Low, (SETH,) an American reform politician, was born at Brooklyn, New York, in 1850, was educated at Columbia College, entered mercantile business, and was elected mayor of Brooklyn on a reform ticket in 1881. He did much to purify municipal politics, and in 1889 was elected president of Columbia University. In 1897 he ran for mayor of New York, but was defeated. He is president of the Archæological Institution of America and vice-president of the New York Academy of Sciences.

Low, (WILL HICOK,) an American artist, born at Albany, New York, May 31, 1853, studied in Europe, 1873–77, under C. Duran and J. L. Gérôme. He became a teacher of life and antique drawing in the National Academy, New York. Among his pictures are "Reverie," (1876,) a portrait of Emma Albani, (1877,) "Skipper Ireson," (1881,) "Arcades," (1882,) and "Telling the Bees," (1884.) He also attained distinction as a decorator and illustrator.

Lŏw'dęr, (CHARLES FUGE,) an English clergyman, born at Bath, June 22, 1820. He was educated at King's College, London, and at Exeter College, Oxford, graduating in 1843. He was ordained a priest of the Established Church in 1844. His principal work was that of a missionary in the East of London, in which region he accomplished much good. He was an extreme ritualist. Died at Zell-am-See, Tyrol, September 9, 1880.

Löwe or Loewe, lö'ẽh, the name of a German family, distinguished in various departments of art. AUGUST LEOPOLD LÖWE, born at Schwedt in 1767, was the composer of a popular opera entitled "The Island of Temptation." Died in 1816. His son FERDINAND, born in 1787, acquired a high reputation as a tragedian. Died in 1832. His daughter SOPHIE, born in 1815, became one of the most celebrated vocalists in Germany. She was married about 1840 to Prince Frederick of Liechtenstein. Died November 29, 1866. Her brother, FRANCIS LOUIS FEODOR, (born in 1816, died in 1890,) distinguished himself as an actor and a poet. JULIA LÖWE, aunt of the preceding, born in 1790, was very successful as an actress at Vienna. She died about 1850.

Lowe, lō, (Sir HUDSON,) a British general, born in Ireland about 1770. He served many campaigns in Egypt, Italy, Germany, etc., and obtained the rank of major-general in 1814. In 1815 he was selected to be the jailer of Bonaparte in Saint Helena. He was censured by many French and English writers for arbitrary, rude, and illiberal treatment of the captive, who in 1816 refused to see him or have any further intercourse with him. Died in 1844.

Löwe, (JOHANN KARL GOTTFRIED,) a German composer, born near Halle in 1796. His works include operas, sonatas, ballads, and oratorios: of the last we may name "The Seven Sleepers." Died in 1869.

Lowe, (ROBERT,) an English financier and eminent orator, born at Bingham in 1811. He graduated at Oxford in 1833, and practised as a barrister in Australia from 1843 to 1850. In 1852 he was returned to Parliament for Kidderminster. He was appointed vice-president of the education board in 1859, but was removed a few years later. He was a leader of the Adullamites, (nominal Liberals, who opposed the Reform Bill of Russell and Gladstone in 1866,) and was one of the ablest and most brilliant debaters in Parliament. He supported Gladstone's motion for the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Ireland, and held the office of chancellor of the exchequer from 1868 to 1873, when he was appointed to the Home Office. He was created LL.D. of Edinburgh in 1867, and D.C.L. of Oxford in 1870. He was elected a member of Parliament for the University of London in 1868. In 1880 he received the title of Viscount Sherbrooke. Died July 27, 1892.

Lōw'ęll, (CHARLES,) D.D., an American divine, a son of Judge Lowell, noticed below, was born at Boston in 1782. He became minister of the West Congregational Church in that city about 1806. He travelled extensively in Europe and the East, returning home in 1840. Among his publications are two volumes of sermons, (1855.) Died January 20, 1861.

Lowell, (FRANCIS CABOT,) brother of John Lowell, (the second of the name,) born at Newburyport in 1775, was one of the principal founders of the city of Lowell, to which he gave his name. He was a merchant and manufacturer of cotton. Died in 1817.

Lowell, (JAMES RUSSELL,) a distinguished American poet, critic, and scholar, the son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, noticed above, was born February 22, 1819. Having graduated at Harvard in 1838, he entered the law school of that institution, where he remained two years, and was admitted to the bar in 1841; but he soon abandoned the profession, that he might devote himself wholly to literature. He published in 1844 a volume of poems containing a "Legend of Brittany," "Prometheus," and a number of smaller pieces. In 1848 appeared a second collection of poems, and in a small volume (separately) "The Vision of Sir Launfal." In the same year he also published the "Biglow Papers," a witty and humorous satire, written in the "Yankee" dialect, on the events of the Mexican war, and a "Fable for Critics," a charming jeu d'esprit, which, in the words of Professor Bowen, is "a very witty review article done into rhyme." It is not too much to say that the best parts of this poem (which, by the way, is very unequal) are scarcely surpassed either in wit or in felicity of expression by anything of a similar kind in the English language. In the summer of 1851 Mr. Lowell visited Europe, and returned home after an absence of somewhat more than a year. In the winter of 1854–55 he delivered in Boston a very popular course of lectures on the British poets. Professor Longfellow having, in 1854, resigned the chair of the modern languages and belles-lettres at Harvard, Mr. Lowell was appointed his successor in January, 1855. On the establishment of the "Atlantic Monthly" in 1857, Professor Lowell became the editor,—a position which he held about five years,—and under his auspices this magazine acquired a wide and deserved popularity. Among his noteworthy poetical productions we may mention "Under the Willows, and other Poems," (1869,) and "The Cathedral," (1870.) Besides the various collections of his poems referred to above, he published several volumes of his prose writings, entitled "Among my Books," (1870; second series, 1876,) and "My Study Windows," (1871.)

Among the poets of America, Lowell is distinguished by the great range, as well as by the versatility, of his powers. He seems equally at home in the playful, the pathetic, or the meditative realms of poetry. And we always rise from the perusal of his productions with the impression that he has not put forth all his strength, but that something still higher would not have been beyond the reach of his genius. In 1877 he was appointed United States minister to Spain, and from 1879 until his removal by President Cleveland in 1885 he was minister to England. In 1883 he was chosen lord rector of St. Andrew's University, and while in England he received the degree of LL.D. from the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. Died August 12, 1891.

He published a novel entitled "The New Priest in Conception Bay," and a collection of poems. Died September 12, 1891.

Löwen or Loewen, lö′ẘẹn, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German poet and writer of fiction, born at Klausthal in 1729; died in 1771.

Löwendahl or Loewendahl, lö′ẘẹn-dȧl′, written also Loevendahl, (ULRICH FRIEDRICH WOLDEMAR,) a celebrated general, born at Hamburg in 1700, was a great-grandson of Frederick III. of Denmark. He entered the service of Russia in the reign of Anne, about 1736, and as general of artillery gained victories over the Turks and Tartars. In 1743 he passed into the French service as lieutenant-general, and in 1745 commanded the reserve corps at Fontenoy. As second in command under Marshal Saxe, he took many towns in Flanders in the same year. For the capture of Bergen-op-Zoom, in 1747, he was rewarded with a marsbal's bâton. He died in 1755.

Löwenhaupt or Loewenhaupt, lö′ẘẹn-hŏwpt′, (ADAM LOUIS,) COUNT, a skilful Swedish general, born in 1659. He was appointed Governor of Riga in 1706. On his march to join the army of Charles XII., who had invaded Russia, he was attacked by the Czar Peter at Liesna in 1708, and lost about 4000 men, but pursued his course. He displayed great courage at Pultowa, July, 1709, and when Charles fled to Turkey the command of the Swedish army devolved on Löwenhaupt, who was forced to capitulate in 1709. He was kept as a prisoner in Russia until his death, in 1719.

Löwenhaupt or Loewenhaupt, von, fon lö′ẘẹn-hŏwpt′, (CARL EMIL,) COUNT, a Swedish general, born in 1692. War having been declared against Russia, he was chosen general-in-chief of an army sent to invade Finland in 1742. His success was hindered by dissensions among the Swedish officers, and he surrendered at Helsingfors, in September, 1742. The anti-war party having become dominant, he was tried for tbat reverse, and executed in 1743.

Löwenhielm or Loewenhielm, lö′wẹn-he-ĕlm′, (CARL GUSTAF,) COUNT OF, a Swedish statesman, was the chief of the party of "Caps." His party baving gained the ascendency in 1765, he was then made minister of foreign affairs. He wrote several memoirs for the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1768.

Löwenhielm or Loewenhielm, (GUSTAF CARL FREDERIK,) COUNT OF, a Swedish diplomatist, born at Stockholm in 1771. He served in the army, and obtained the rank of general. He represented Sweden at the Congress of Vienna, (1814,) and was Swedish minister at the court of Paris from 1818 until 1856. He wrote several military treatises, and a remarkable work on the organization of government. Died in 1856.

Lŏw′er, (RICHARD,) F.R.S., an eminent English anatomist, born in Cornwall about 1630. He became a friend and coadjutor of Dr. Willis, whom he assisted in his work on the "Anatomy of the Brain." In 1661 he confirmed the Harveian theory by experiments on the transfusion of blood. He practised medicine in London many years, and wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on the Heart, on the Motion of the Blood," etc. Died in 1691.

Lower, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English dramatist, born in Cornwall; died in 1662.

Lowitz, lo′ẘits, (GEORG MORITZ,) a German astronomer, born near Nuremberg in 1722. He became professor of mathematics at Göttingen about 1755, and was afterwards director of the observatory at that place. In 1766 he removed to Saint Petersburg, and was admitted into the Academy of Sciences, by which he was employed in astronomical observations. He was killed by some rebels at Dmetriefsk in 1774. He had written several memoirs on astronomy.

His son TOBIAS, born at Göttingen in 1757, became one of the most eminent members of the Imperial Academy of Saint Petersburg, and professor of chemistry. Died in 1804.

Low'man, (MOSES,) a learned English divine, born in London in 1680. About 1710 he settled at Clapham, where he preached many years to a congregation of Dissenters. He wrote a "Rationale of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship," and other works. Died in 1752.

Lowndes, lŏwndz, (RAWLINS,) born in the British West Indies in 1722, settled at Charleston, South Carolina, where he rose to eminence as a statesman and lawyer. He was elected president or Governor of South Carolina in 1778. Died in 1800.

Lowndes, (WILLIAM JONES,) an eminent American statesman, a son of the preceding, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 7th of February, 1782. He studied law, and married a daughter of General Thomas Pinckney. In 1810 or 1811 he was elected a member of Congress for a district of South Carolina. He was an eloquent debater, and was eminent for his wisdom and logical acumen. He is said to have been modest and unambitious. He continued to serve in Congress about eleven years, and was chairman of the committee of ways and means from 1818 to 1822. It appears that he was a general favourite, and was reputed to stand in the first rank of American statesmen. His health having failed, he sailed for Europe, but died on the voyage in October, 1822.

See "Encyclopædia Americana," (Supplement.)

Lowndes, (WILLIAM THOMAS,) an English bibliographer, lived in London. He published, about 1834, "The Bibliographer's Manual," which is highly esteemed. Died in 1843.

Lŏw'ry, (WILSON,) a skilful English engraver, born at Whitehaven in 1762, became a resident of London. He contributed to the perfection of his art by several important inventions, and acquired a high reputation, especially as an engraver of architecture and mechanism, in which he was unsurpassed. He engraved many figures for Rees's "Cyclopædia." Died in 1824.

Lowth, lŏwth, (ROBERT,) an English bishop and eminent writer, born at Winchester in 1710, was the son of William Lowth, noticed below. He was educated at Oxford, and became eminent as a biblical scholar. Having been chosen professor of poetry at Oxford, (1741,) he delivered "Lectures on the Poetry of the Hebrews," (in Latin,) which were published in 1753, and often reprinted. This work was highly esteemed by the most eminent critics. He was appointed Bishop of Saint David's in 1766, translated to the see of Oxford in the same year, and to that of London in 1777. Among his most important works is an excellent "Translation of the Prophet Isaiah," (1778.) Died in 1787.

See P. HALL, "Life of Bishop Lowth," 1834; "Memoirs of the Life of Robert Lowth," London, 1797; "Monthly Review" for February and March, 1779, and April, 1780.

Lowth, (WILLIAM,) a scholar and commentator, the father of Robert, noticed above, was born in London in 1661. He was chaplain to the Bishop of Winchester, and became rector of Buriton about 1700. He wrote several highly esteemed works, among which are "Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures," (1708,) and a "Commentary on the Four Greater Prophets," (4 vols., 1714-26.) Died in 1732.

Lowther, (WILLIAM.) See LONSDALE, EARL OF.

Loyd, loid, (LEWIS,) an English banker, born in 1768. He was a partner of the banking-house of Jones, Loyd & Co., London, and was distinguished as a financier. He died in 1858. His son, Samuel J. Loyd, received the title of Lord Overstone.

Loyer, Le, lẹh lwâ'yâ', (PIERRE,) a French lawyer, born in Anjou in 1550, was learned in antiquities and Oriental languages. He wrote a curious work on demonology, entitled "On Spectres, Angels, and Demons distinctly manifesting themselves to Men," ("Quatres Livres des Spectres, Anges et Démons se montrant sensiblement aux Hommes,") and other works. Died in 1634.

Loyola, loi-o'la, [Sp. pron. lo-yo'lâ,] (IGNATIUS,) originally Don IÑIGO LOPEZ de Recalde, (dà rà-kâl'dà,) often called Saint Ignatius, (ig-nā'she-us;) [Fr. SAINT-IGNACE, sân'tẽn'yâs'; It. SANT' IGNAZIO, sânt ẽn-yât'-se-o,] a celebrated Spanish reformer, and the founder of the order of Jesuits, was born of a noble family at Loyola Castle, in Biscay, in 1491. He received from nature an ardent, imaginative temperament, and in youth was the very prototype of the hero of Cervantes, an enthusiastic votary of chivalrous romance. After signalizing his gallantry in several campaigns, he received about 1520, at the siege of Pampeluna, a wound which made him a cripple for life. During the tedious confinement which followed, his attention was directed to the mysteries of religion. Ascribing his recovery to a miracle of grace, he dedicated himself to arduous religious enterprises and to the service of the Blessed Virgin. He became a popular preacher, and was renowned for his penances and vigils. In 1523 he performed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, from which he returned to Spain in 1524. He passed several ensuing years at Alcalá and Salamanca in the study of grammar, philosophy, etc., which he had neglected to learn in his youth. In 1528 he became a student in the University of Paris, where he found several congenial spirits, among whom were Francis Xavier and James Lainez. With these he formed in 1534 a religious society devoted to the education of youth, the renovation of the Catholic Church, and the conversion of the infidels.

After they had digested the polity and peculiar maxims of the new order, Paul III. gave it his formal sanction in 1540, and Loyola was chosen superior or general (with absolute power) of the order, which was styled the Society of Jesus. Loyola thenceforth remained in Rome, and witnessed the extraordinary success of his efforts. "Under his rule," says Macaulay, "the order grew rapidly to the full measure of its gigantic powers. With what vehemence, with what policy, with what exact discipline, with what dauntless courage, with what self-denial, with what unscrupulous laxity and versatility in the choice of means, the Jesuits fought the battles of their Church, is written in every page of the annals of Europe during several generations. In the Order of Jesus was concentrated the quintessence of the Catholic spirit; and the history of the Order of Jesus is the history of the great Catholic reaction. This order possessed itself at once of all the strongholds which command the public mind,—of the pulpit, of the press, of the confessional, of the academies. . . . Nor was it less their office to plot against the thrones and lives of apostate kings, to spread evil rumours, to raise tumults, to inflame civil wars, to arm the hand of the assassin." (See Review of Ranke's "History of the Popes.") It does not appear, however, that Loyola was responsible for the corruptions referred to in the above quotation. His chief work is "Spiritual Exercises," ("Exercicios espirituales," 1548,) in which he gives rules and counsels for the guidance of believers. He died in 1556, and was canonized as a saint by the pope in 1622.

Lu'cạn, (GEORGE CHARLES BINGHAM,) EARL OF, a British general, a son of the Earl of Lucan, was born in London in 1800. He succeeded to the earldom about 1840. In 1854–55 he served in the Crimea in command of a division of cavalry, and took part in the battles of the Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman. He became colonel in the Life-Guards in 1855, and was made lieutenant-general in 1858, and general in 1865. Died in 1888.

Lu'cạn, [Lat. LUCA'NUS; Fr. LUCAIN, lü'kăn'; It. LUCANO, loo-kâ'no,] (MARCUS ANNÆUS,) a Roman epic poet, born at Corduba, (Córdova,) Spain, in 38 A.D., was a nephew of the philosopher Seneca. He was educated at Rome. His early poems procured him the favour of Nero, who appointed him quæstor and augur and condescended to appear as his rival in a literary contest. Lucan gained the prize, but at the same time lost the favour of the tyrant, whom he had formerly addressed with gross adulation. Nero forbade him to read any more poems in public. Lucan, with Piso and others, conspired against the life of Nero; the plot was detected, and the poet was put to death in 65 A.D. His fame rests on a poem entitled "Pharsalia," which treats of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, and displays great beauties with great defects. Among the latter is an inflated, declamatory style. Corneille and Voltaire were warm admirers of Lucan. "His genius," says Villemain, referring to his early death, "had only time to produce grandeur, without naturalness or truth." Among his merits are exalted imagination, intense energy, and impressive diction.

Lucca, look'kȧ, (PAULINE,) an Austrian operatic singer, born at Vienna, of Jewish parents, in 1842. At an early age she entered the chorus of the opera at Vienna, and in 1859 created a sensation by her manner of leading the Bridesmaids' Chorus. In the same year she made her début at Olmutz, in the character of "Elvira" in "Ernani," and at once established herself as a popular favourite. Attracting the attention of Meyerbeer, the composer, he secured for her an engagement in Berlin in 1861. Here she was appointed court singer for life, but severed her connection in 1872. During this period she also sang in London and Saint Petersburg, and achieved a Continental reputation. In September, 1872, she visited the United States, where she remained for two years. She then returned to Europe, and, after making a tour of all the principal cities in Germany except Berlin, finally settled in Vienna. Lucca married Baron Rahden in 1865, but was shortly afterwards divorced from him.

Lucceius, luk-see'us, (LUCIUS,) a Roman orator and friend of Cicero, flourished about 60 B.C.

Lucchesini, look-kȧ-śee'nee, (CESARE,) an Italian philologist, born at Lucca in 1756, was a brother of the marquis, noticed below. He acquired a European reputation by his numerous works on philology, among which is "The Sources of Ancient and Modern Languages." Died in 1832.

Lucchesini, (GIOVANNI VINCENZO,) an Italian scholar, born at Lucca in 1660. He lived in Rome, and obtained from Clement XII. the high office of secretary of briefs. He published an edition of Demosthenes' Orations, with notes and a good Latin translation, and a "History of Europe from 1678 to about 1735." Died in 1744.

Lucchesini, da, dȧ look-kȧ-śee'nee, (GIROLAMO,) MARQUIS, an able diplomatist, born at Lucca in 1752. He removed to Berlin in the latter part of the reign of Frederick the Great, who appointed him his librarian and reader. He was sent as minister of Prussia to Vienna in 1793, and to Paris in 1802. After the battle of Jena (1806) he negotiated a truce with the victor; but it was not ratified by the Prussian court. Soon after this event he returned to Lucca. He wrote a work called "On the Causes and Effects of the Confederation of the Rhine," (1819.) Died in 1825.

Luce, (STEPHEN BLEECKER,) an American admiral, born at Albany, New York, in 1827. He was appointed midshipman in 1841, became rear-admiral in 1885, and retired in 1889. He has been an associate editor of "Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia" and naval editor of the "Standard Dictionary," and has published "Seamanship."

Luce de Lancival, lüs dẹh lȯN'se'vȧl', (JEAN CHARLES JULIEN,) a French littérateur, born in Picardy in 1764. He was chosen professor of belles-lettres in the Prytanée, a college of Paris, about 1797. Among his best productions are a poem called "Achilles at Scyros," (1805,) and "Hector," a tragedy, (1809,) which Villemain pronounces "truly Homeric." Died in 1810.

Lucian, loo'she-an, [Gr. Λουκιανός; Lat. LUCIA'NUS; Fr. LUCIEN, lü'se-ȧN'; It. LUCIANO, loo-chā'no,] one of the most witty and original Greek writers, was born at Samosata, (Someisat,) on the Euphrates, about 120 A.D. He practised law a short time at Antioch, and exchanged that profession for the more lucrative pursuit of sophist and teacher of rhetoric, which he followed with success in Gaul until he was about forty years old. Again changing his profession, he returned to the East, and lived many years at Athens, where he was intimate with Demonax and employed his time in literary composition. His principal works are dialogues, written in pure and elegant Greek, on history, mythology, philosophy, and various other subjects. His object appears to have been to cure men of their prejudices and superstitions and their foolish admiration of philosophic charlatans. His genius is eminently satirical, and his works are remarkably humorous; but some of them are censured as offensive to morality and religion. Among the titles of his dialogues are "Timon the Misanthrope," "Charon," "Menippus," and "The Assembly of Gods." English versions of his dialogues have been published by T. Franklin (1780) and William Tooke, (1820.) Wieland produced a good German translation. Good editions of the Greek text have been published by Dindorf (Paris, 1840) and Bekker, (1853.)

Lucian, [Fr. LUCIEN, lü'se'ăN',] SAINT, a Christian martyr, born at Samosata in the third century, was eminent for piety and learning. He was ordained a priest or presbyter at Antioch. He prepared a revised edition of the Scriptures, which, Jerome says, was more correct than those of Hesychius and Pamphilus. Diocletian having issued an edict against the Christians, Lucian suffered martyrdom in 312 A.D.

Lu'cĭ-fẹr, Bishop of Calaris, (now Cagliari,) in Sardinia, was noted for his intolerance and zeal against Arianism. About 355 A.D. he was banished by Constantius, who favoured the Arians. He wrote a "Defence of Athanasius," and other works. He refused to recognize as orthodox those bishops who signed the formula of Rimini, (359,) or to have fellowship with any who recognized them, and finally became the author of a schism. He had many followers, who formed a distinct sect, called Luciferians. Died about 370 A.D.

Lu-cil'ĭ-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman satiric poet, born at Suessa Aurunca, (now Sessa,) in Italy, about 148 B.C., was a great-uncle of Pompey the Great. In early youth he served under Scipio Africanus at the siege of Numantia, and became an intimate friend of that general. He composed thirty satires and various other poems; but only fragments of his works have come down to us. Horace asserts that he was the first writer of satire among the Romans, (Sat., lib. 2, i. 62.) His satires were much admired by many ancient critics, including Cicero, Quintilian, and Pliny. "He was," says Professor Sellar, "vehement in invective, because he was thoroughly earnest in his purpose to expose vice and baseness among the high and low with impartial severity. Although probably few writers of verse have had less poetical faculty, yet, by his originality and force of character, he became the favourite of his own time and country; and he alone among Roman writers has introduced a new and permanent form of poetry into the world." Died about 100 B.C.

See SELLAR, "Roman Poets of the Republic," chap. vi.; PETERMANN, "Dissertatio de C. Lucilii Vita," 1842; SMITH, "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography."

Lucil'ius Ju'nior, a Roman poet and naturalist, lived in the first century, and was a friend of Seneca. He is supposed to be the author of a poem of six hundred and forty hexameter verses, entitled "Ætna," which presents some fine passages.

Lu-cī'nạ, [Fr. LUCINE, lü'sèn',] the name of the goddess that brings to light and presides over the birth of children, was used as a surname of Juno and of Diana, both of whom were supposed to assist women in parturition, and were sometimes called LUCINÆ. The Greek goddess ILITHYI'A or EILEITHYIA ['Ειλείθυια] appears to be essentially the same as Diana (Artemis) in her character of Lucina.

Lucius, loo'she-us, [Fr. LUCE, lüss,] I., Bishop of Rome, succeeded Cornelius in October, 252 A.D., and died in March, 253. Stephen I. was his successor.

Lucius II., a native of Bologna, was elected pope in March, 1144, as successor to Celestine II. He died in 1145, after a pontificate of eleven months, and Eugenius III. was chosen in his place.

Lucius III. (Cardinal UBALDO OF LUCCA) was elected pope in 1181, after the death of Alexander III. His election was the first that was decided by the cardinals, the clergy and people being excluded from the right to vote. A revolt of the people of Rome obliged him to leave the city, and he retired to Verona. He died in 1185, and was succeeded by Urban III.

Lucius, (CÆSAR,) a Roman prince, born 17 B.C., was a son of M. Agrippa and Julia, who was a daughter of the emperor Augustus. He and his brother Caius were heirs-presumptive of the empire, but they died before Augustus. Lucius died in 2 A.D. The Maison Carrée at Nîmes was a temple dedicated to Caius and Lucius.

Lucius, lu'she-us, [It. LUCIO, loo'cho,] (GIOVANNI,) a historian, born at Trau, in Dalmatia. He published in 1666 a "History of Dalmatia and Croatia." Died in 1684.

Lücke or Luecke, lük'kẹh, (GOTTFRIED CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH,) an eminent German theologian, was born at Egeln, near Magdeburg, in 1791. He studied at Halle in 1810, and subsequently at Göttingen, where he formed a friendship with Bunsen and Lachmann. He became professor of theology at Bonn in 1818, and soon after published, conjointly with Schleiermacher and De Wette, the "Theological Journal." His "Commentary on the Writings of Saint John the Evangelist" (4 vols., 1820–32) is esteemed one of the best works of its kind. In 1827 he succeeded Stäudlin in the chair of theology at Göttingen. Died at Göttingen in 1855.

Luckner, lo͝ok'nẹr, (NIKOLAUS,) a marshal of France, born at Kampen, in Bavaria, in 1722. At an early age he entered the service of Prussia, for which he fought with distinction in the Seven Years' war, (1756–63.) About 1763 he accepted the rank of lieutenant-general in the French army, which for many subsequent years was not called into active service. Having submitted to the new régime, he was promoted to the rank of marshal in December, 1791. In the spring of 1792 he obtained command of one of the armies which defended the frontier against the Austrians, and a few weeks later succeeded Rochambeau as general-in-chief. The dominant party, distrusting both his fidelity and capacity, deprived him of the command in 1792. He was guillotined in January, 1794.

Lucrèce. See LUCRETIA and LUCRETIUS.

Lucretia, loo-kree'she-a, [It. LUCREZIA, loo-krĕt'se-ä; Fr. LUCRÈCE, lü'krȧs',] a Roman lady, distinguished for her beauty, virtue, and tragical destiny, was the wife of Collatinus, who was related to Tarquin the Proud, King of Rome. The outrage offered to her honour by Sextus Tarquin, and the voluntary sacrifice of her life, (507 B.C.,) have furnished a favourite theme for poets and painters, and, according to a doubtful legend, caused the dethronement of Tarquin, and the conversion of the Roman state into a republic, under the direction of Junius Brutus.

Lucretius, lu-kree'she-us, [Fr. LUCRÈCE, lü'krȧss'; It. LUCREZIO, loo-krĕt'se-o; Sp. LUCRECIO, loo-krā'the-o,] or, to give his full name, Ti'tus Lucre'tius Ca'rus, one of the greatest Latin poets, was born in Italy in 95 B.C., and was contemporary with Cicero. The records of antiquity throw scarcely any light on his life, which was probably passed in studious retirement. It is not known whether he ever visited Greece; but it is evident from his writings that he had profoundly studied the language, philosophy, and manners of that people. A doubtful tradition asserts that he was subject to insanity caused by a love-potion; and the statement that he committed suicide in his forty-fourth year is generally credited. He left only one work,—a philosophic and didactic poem, in six books, entitled "De Rerum Naturâ," ("On the Nature of Things,") in which he expounds and illustrates the physical and ethical doctrines of Epicurus, of whom he was a disciple. From such abstruse speculations and intractable subjects he has produced one of the most admirable poems in the language. Although his system is erroneous and incoherent, his reasoning is remarkably clear and close. Probably no other work so amply demonstrates the power of the Latin language to utter the sublimest conceptions with a sustained majesty and harmony. "A great atheistic poet," says Villemain, "is surely a surprising phenomenon. His genius finds sublime accents to attack all the inspirations of genius. He renders even nothingness poetic; he insults glory; he enjoys death. Out of the abyss of skepticism he sometimes soars to a height of enthusiasm which is rivalled only by the sublimity of Homer." Referring to this work, Macaulay remarks, "The finest poem in the Latin language—indeed, the finest didactic poem in any language—was written in defence of the silliest and meanest of all systems of natural and moral philosophy." Ovid appears to be the only contemporary writer who fully appreciated the genius of Lucretius.

Lu-cul'lus, (LUCIUS LICINIUS,) a celebrated Roman general, born of a patrician family about 110 B.C. In the year 87 he went to Asia as quæstor under Sulla, who gave him many proofs of his confidence. After an absence of several years, during which the civil war between Marius and Sulla raged at Rome, he returned, and was elected consul in 74 B.C. In this year he obtained the chief command in the war against Mithridates, whom he defeated at Cyzicus in 73, and, after other victories, drove him out of the kingdom of Pontus. He afterwards defeated Tigranes of Armenia, whose capital he took about 68 B.C. The mutiny of his troops prevented his final triumph over Mithridates, and he was superseded by Pompey in the year 66. Cicero expressed the opinion that so great a war was never conducted with more prudence and courage. ("Pro Muræna.") Lucullus then retired from public affairs, and expended part of the immense fortune he had acquired in the East in building magnificent villas, giving sumptuous entertainments, and collecting expensive paintings and statues. He was a liberal patron of learning and the arts. Sulla had dedicated to him his Commentaries. Plutarch, after comparing him with Cimon, says it is hard to say to which side the balance inclines. He was living in 59, but was not living in 56 B.C.

Lu'cy, (HENRY W.,) an English journalist and author, born at Crosby in 1845. He became a reporter in 1864, joined the staff of "Pall Mall Gazette" in 1870, and of "Daily News" in 1876, and edited "Daily News" 1886–87. He continued for "Punch" the "Essence of Parliament" of Shirley Brooks and Tom Taylor, his contributions being entitled "The Diary of Toby, M.P." He wrote a number of works on parliamentary procedure, history, etc., and several novels, some of his later works being "Faces and Places," (1895,) "The Miller's Niece," (1896,) etc.

Luden, loo'dĕn, (HEINRICH,) a distinguished German historical and political writer, born in the duchy of Bremen in 1780. He became in 1810 professor of philosophy at Jena, where he also lectured on history. His most important work is a "History of the German Nation," ("Die Geschichte des Deutschen Volkes," 12 vols., 1825–37,) brought down to 1237. He also wrote general histories of the nations of antiquity and of the middle ages, a "Life of Hugo Grotius," (1806,) several biographies, etc. Died at Jena in 1847.

Ludewig. See LUDOVICI, (KARL GUNTHER.)

Ludewig, von, fon loo'dĕh-ŵig', (JOHANN PETER,) a learned German jurist and historian, born in Suabia about 1670. He became professor of philosophy at Halle in 1695, and of history in 1703. The King of Prussia made him a privy councillor in 1709. Among his works are "Germania Princeps," (1702,) treating on the rights, privileges, etc. of the house of Austria and of the Electors, "Writers of German History," ("Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum," 1718,) and a "Life of Justinian," (1730.) Died in 1743.

Lŭd'lō̆w, (EDMUND,) an able English republican general, born in Wiltshire about 1620. He fought against the king at Edgehill in 1642, and led a regiment at the battle of Newbury. Elected to Parliament in 1645, he voted for the conversion of the kingdom into a republic, and was one of the judges who condemned Charles I. in 1649. In this year he was chosen a member of the council of state, in which he opposed the ambitious designs of Cromwell. In 1650 he went to Ireland as lieutenant-general. On the death of Ireton, November, 1651, the command of the army devolved on Ludlow. As he refused to support the government of the Protector, (1653,) he was deprived of command. After the death of Oliver (1658) he resumed his seat in Parliament, and obtained command of the army in Ireland in 1659. At the restoration (1660) he escaped through France to Vevay, where he resided mostly until his death, in 1693. He left Memoirs of his life, (2 vols., 1698.) Macaulay refers to him as "almost the only survivor, [in 1689,] certainly the most illustrious survivor, of a mighty race of men, the judges of a king, the founders of a republic. . . . There was but a single blemish on his fame,"—i.e. the execution of Charles I.

Lud'lōw, (FITZHUGH,) an American author, born at Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1837, the son of a Congregationalist minister. He graduated at Union College in 1856. Among his works are "The Hasheesh-Eater," (1857,) "Little Brother," (1867,) "What Shall they Do to be Saved?" (1868,) and "The Heart of the Continent," (1870.) He died at Geneva, Switzerland, September 13, 1870, a victim of the opium-habit. He wrote several very popular student-songs.

Ludlow, (JAMES MEEKER,) an American clergyman, born at Elizabeth, New Jersey, in 1841. He was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, and became pastor of several churches in New York and its vicinity. He is the author of "My Saint John," "Captain of the Janizaries," "A King of Tyre," "History of the Crusades," etc.

Ludlow, (JOHN MALCOLM,) a British author, born at Nimach, India, in 1821. He was a barrister at Lincoln's Inn, conveyancer, etc., and wrote "British India," (2 vols., 1858,) "The United States from Independence to Secession," (1862,) "Popular Epics of the Middle Ages," (2 vols., 1865,) "The War of American Independence," (1876,) etc.

Ludlow, (WILLIAM,) an American general, born at Riverside, Long Island, in 1843. He graduated at West Point in 1864, served in the engineer corps during the final year of the civil war, and was afterwards chief engineer in several Western expeditions and in operations on the Atlantic coast. From 1883 to 1886 he served as chief engineer of the Philadelphia water-works, subsequently resuming his engineering duties under the government. He was president of the Nicaragua Canal Commission in 1895, and successively brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers in the Spanish-American war of 1898. On November 1, 1899, he was appointed military governor of Havana. He wrote works descriptive of his explorations in the Black Hills and the Yellowstone country, and numerous reports of engineering operations.

Luiken, loi'kẹn, (JAN,) a Dutch engraver, born in 1649; died in 1708. He published in 1671 a noteworthy volume of poems.

Luini, loo-ee'nee, (AURELIO,) an Italian painter, a son of Bernardino, noticed below, was born about 1530. He worked at Milan, and painted scriptural subjects, among which is "The Adoration of the Magi." He died, according to Lanzi, in 1593; but some date his death many years earlier.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Luini, Luvini, loo-vee'nee, or Lovini, lo-vee'nee, (BERNARDINO,) an eminent Italian painter, was born at Luino, on Lake Maggiore. He is called the most excellent imitator and pupil of Leonardo da Vinci. Lomazzo says he was already a distinguished painter in 1500. Luini worked both in fresco and oil, and painted at Milan several works which are still in good preservation. "Few painters," says Lanzi, "deserve to be compared to him." Among his master-pieces in oil are a "Magdalene," a "Madonna," and a "Saint John with a Lamb," all at Milan. He excelled in colouring, chiaroscuro, and the expression of feminine grace. He died after 1530. His sons, AURELIO and EVANGELISTA, were skilful painters.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.; LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Luini, (EVANGELISTA,) a decorative painter of Milan, was a son of the preceding. Died after 1584.

Luitprand, loo'it-prand or lūt'prand, written also Liutprand, King of the Lombards, the son of Ansprand, reigned from 712 A.D. until 744. His valour and wisdom are praised by Sismondi. In 739 he marched into France to aid Charles Martel against the Saracens. He died in 744, and was succeeded by his nephew Hildebrand.

Luitprand or Liutprand, [Lat. LUITPRAN'DUS,] a historical writer, was one of the most learned men of the age. He was sent as ambassador to Constantinople in 946 by Berenger, Marquis of Ivrea. Having been chosen Bishop of Cremona, he attended in 963 a council (at Rome) which deposed Pope John. In 968 the emperor Otho I. sent him on a mission to Constantinople, where he was maltreated by the emperor. He was author of an esteemed "History of Europe from 862 to 964."

Lukaszewitsch, loo-kä'shĕ-vĭtch, (JOSEPH,) a Polish writer, born at Krompkowo, November 30, 1797, published works on ecclesiastical history, including a "History of the Churches of the Helvetic Confession in Lithuania," (1842.) Died February 13, 1873.

Luke, [Gr. Λουκᾶς; Lat. LU'CAS; Fr. LUC, lük; It. LUCA, loo'kä,] SAINT, one of the Four Evangelists, was a companion of the Apostle Paul in his mission to the Gentiles, between 50 and 66 A.D. The time and place of his birth are unknown. That he was liberally educated is made evident by the classical style of his writings and by the learned details which he gives on historical and geographical subjects. His Gospel contains valuable accounts which are not found in the others. He also wrote "The Acts of the Apostles," which, as well as his Gospel, is in the Greek language. Tradition indicates that Saint Luke is the same as the physician Luke mentioned by Saint Paul in Colossians iv. 14, and the same as Lucas named in Philemon 24. (See II. Timothy iv. 11.)

Lu'kin, (LIONEL,) an English mechanic, noted as the inventor of the life-boat, was born about 1742; died in 1834.

Lulli or Lulle, lool'lee, [Fr. LULLE, lül,] (ANTONIO,) a grammarian, born in Majorca. He corresponded with Erasmus, and wrote a treatise on rhetoric, called "De Oratione." Died in 1582.

Lulli or Lully, lü'le', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated Italian composer, called "the father of French dramatic music," was born at Florence in 1633. About the age of fourteen he went to Paris, where he became a skilful performer on the violin, and was patronized by Louis XIV. In the fêtes which were often repeated at court, he found occasion to try his talents for operatic music. In 1672 the king gave him the privilége or direction of the Royal Academy of Music, from which time dates the foundation of the Grand Opera in France. Co-operating with Quinault the poet, Lulli composed in fifteen years nineteen operas, which were very successful. He finally became one of the secretaries of the king. Died in 1687.

Lulli or Lully, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a son of the preceding, born in 1665. With his brother Louis he composed an opera called "Orphée," (1690.) Died in 1701.

Lulli, (JEAN LOUIS,) born in 1667, succeeded his father, Jean Baptiste, as composer to the king. Died in 1688.

Lulli, (LOUIS,) a musician, brother of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1664. He became composer to the king in 1688. Died about 1736.

Lulli, written also Lully, Lulle, and Lull, [Lat. LUL'LUS or LUL'LIUS,] (RAYMOND,) a philosopher, surnamed THE ENLIGHTENED DOCTOR, was born at Palma, in Majorca, about 1235. He professed to believe that he was called to convert the Moslems, and he prepared himself for the task by learning Arabic. In order to prove that the mysteries of faith were not opposed to reason, he composed a treatise, or method, called "Ars Lulli," or "Ars Magna Lulli," ("The Great Art of Lulli,") designed also to systematize knowledge and facilitate the process of reasoning on all questions. His method obtained great celebrity; but, according to Hallam, it was an "idle and fraudulent attempt to substitute trick for science." "He was one of those innovators in philosophy who, by much boasting of their original discoveries in the secrets of truth, gain credit for systems of science which those who believe in them seldom trouble themselves to examine." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") But Hallam's judgment is much too severe. Lulli was full of quixotic and fantastical projects, of which his "Great Art" was one, but he was honest and generous, and in many ways far in advance of his times. He wrote many treatises and tractates in Latin and in the Catalan tongue. He made several attempts to convert the Moors in Northern Africa, and was violently persecuted by them. He died in consequence of injuries received from the Moslems in 1315.

Lu'ther, (MARTIN,) [Ger. pron. mar'tin loo'tẹr; Lat. MARTI'NUS LUTHE'RUS; It. MARTINO LUTERO, mar-tee'no loo-tā'ro; Sp. MARTIN LUTERO, mar-tēn' loo-tā'ro,] the great leader of the Reformation in Germany, was born at Eisleben, the 10th of November, 1483. He was the son of Hans Luther, a miner. His mother's maiden name was Margarethe Lindemann. At the age of fifteen he was sent to the Latin school at Eisenach, then under the direction of Trebonius. In 1501 he entered the university at Erfurt. While here, he found in the university library a rare and precious book,—a Latin Bible,—which became an object of extraordinary interest to him. About this time a severe attack of illness, and, soon after, the sudden death of one of his intimate friends, (caused, as some historians state, by a stroke of lightning,) produced such an impression on the mind of young Luther, that he made a solemn vow to become a monk, and in July, 1505, he entered the Augustine convent at Erfurt. In 1507 he was ordained a priest, and in the following year, through the influence of Staupitz, (the provincial of his order, and subsequently vicar-general,) he was appointed professor of philosophy in the University of Wittenberg. Luther's visit to Rome, made in 1510, in fulfilment of a previous vow, opened to him new views of the character and condition of the Romish Church. In 1512 he was made licentiate and doctor of divinity, and began about this time to declare openly his views of scriptural theology, which he explained according to the system of Saint Augustine, resting the doctrine of justification solely on faith in the sacrifice of the Saviour. In 1517, Tetzel, a Dominican monk, received from the pope, (Leo X.,) through the Archbishop of Magdeburg, a commission for the sale of indulgences. With a view to increase the demand for his merchandise, Tetzel asserted, what few or none of the other Catholics appear to have ever claimed, that the indulgences not only released the purchasers from the necessity of penance, but absolved them from all the consequences of sin both here and hereafter. Indignant at what he regarded as an insult to reason and religion, Luther drew up his celebrated ninety-five propositions, in which he set forth in the strongest language the theological unsoundness as well as the pernicious effects of Tetzel's doctrine of indulgences. This publication involved Luther in violent controversies. Among the most conspicuous of his opponents was Dr. Eck, (in Latin, Eckius or Eccius,) professor of divinity at Ingolstadt. But the cause of the Reformer steadily gained ground, and among the number of his favourers was Frederick the Wise, the Elector of Saxony,—one of the most powerful princes of Germany. Leo having summoned Luther to plead his cause at Rome, the Elector interposed, and it was arranged that the examination or trial should take place at Augsburg, before Cardinal Cajetan, (Caietano,) the legate of the pope. The cardinal having refused to enter into any discussion with Luther, at the same time insisting that the latter should submit himself unreservedly to the authority of the papal see, Luther, fearing—perhaps with too much reason—the fate of John Huss, secretly withdrew from Augsburg, leaving an "appeal to the pope when he should be better informed." Soon after Leo issued a bull in support of the doctrine of indulgences; whereupon Luther appealed from the pope to a general council of the Church.

With a view to restore tranquillity to the Church, Leo sent his chamberlain Miltitz—a Saxon by birth, and a man of great tact and intelligence—as nuncio into Germany. By kindness and flattery, Miltitz obtained from Luther (March, 1519) a promise that he would submit to the authority of the pope and discontinue the controversy respecting indulgences, on condition that his adversaries should also preserve silence on the subject. Dr. Eck, however, would not permit the controversy to slumber. He soon after challenged Carlstadt, one of Luther's disciples, to a public dispute at Leipsic; so that Luther himself was again almost unavoidably involved in the contest. The result was a confirmation of his former views of the fallibility of the pope and the errors of the Church, which found expression in several publications, and especially in a work entitled "De Captivitate Babylonicâ Ecclesiæ," ("On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church.") Leo had, a short time previously to this publication, issued a bull condemning forty-one propositions which had been selected from the works of Luther, and directing the bishops to search diligently for the writings in which those errors were contained, and to have them publicly burned. Luther resolved to anticipate the blow, and at the same time to render the breach between himself and Rome forever impassable. Attended by a crowd of doctors, professors, and students, he proceeded to a spot fixed on for the purpose, without the walls of Wittenberg, near the east gate, and there burned before the assembled multitude the bull, with the accompanying decretals and canons relating to the pope's supreme authority.

Up to this period, it would appear that the reverence for the Church in which Luther had been educated had always exercised a controlling influence upon his mind; for, although he denounced in the boldest manner the abuses of the ecclesiastical power, he had ever manifested a profound respect for the sovereign pontiff himself. But now he broke through all restraint, and not only denied the authority of the pope, but he assailed him with all the fierce invective and vituperation which were so common in that age.

After this additional provocation, it was not to be expected that the thunders of the Church should slumber. Not content with merely excommunicating Luther and laying every place which should harbour him under an interdict, Leo urged the newly-elected emperor, Charles V., to come forward as the champion of Catholicism and inflict upon the arch-heretic and his adherents the punishment due to their apostasy. But the Elector of Saxony, to whom Charles had been indebted for his new dignity, interposed a second time, and so far prevailed that it was determined the cause of Luther should be tried before the Diet of the empire. The Diet assembled at Worms early in the year 1521. It was the wish and intention of the legate Aleander and the other advocates of the papal cause that Luther should not be present at his own trial. But the majority of the Diet, whether influenced by friendship for the Reformer or by the desire to preserve the appearance of justice in their proceedings, insisted that Luther should not be condemned unheard. The emperor was prevailed upon to grant him a safe-conduct, (dated March 6, 1521.) The greater number of Luther's friends earnestly dissuaded him from going to Worms. Even Spalatin, the secretary and confidential adviser of the Elector Frederick, sent him a pressing message exhorting him on no account to enter that city. Luther replied, "Were there as many devils in Worms as tiles upon the roofs of the houses, still would I enter," ("Wenn so viel Teufel zu Worms wären als Ziegel auf den Dächern, doch wollt' ich hinein.") He arrived in the city on the 16th of April, and appeared before the Diet the following day. When asked if he was the author of the works produced against him, containing the passages which had been condemned, he replied in the affirmative. On being again asked whether he was prepared to retract the objectionable doctrines contained in them, he answered that, as this question concerned the word of God, the Christian faith, and the salvation of souls, it was of great importance that he should not speak rashly, lest he should offend against the word of God: he therefore desired that time might be allowed him for consideration. The next day he was again brought before the Diet. While he admitted that in some instances he might have written with less humility and more violence than became his ecclesiastical character, he refused to retract anything that he had said, unless it could be shown to be contrary to the Scriptures; at the same time, he boldly repeated and defended several of his positions which had been objected to. Hereupon Charles and the other favourers of the Catholic cause refused to hear him any further. He was commanded to leave Worms. He accordingly returned to Saxony. As he was journeying on the borders of the Thuringian Forest, he was suddenly seized by a number of warriors in masks, and hurried off to the solitary castle of Wartburg, where his ecclesiastical habit was exchanged for the dress and sword of a knight. This whole proceeding was a stratagem of Frederick to protect the Reformer against the designs of his enemies. Luther had previously been apprised of the scheme. He remarks, in one of his letters, that he scarcely knew himself in his strange disguise.

Immediately after the departure of Luther, Aleander, the Papal legate, prevailed on Charles to give the edict against him the sanction of the imperial signature and seal. It was declared, in the name of the emperor, that, as soon as the term of his safe-conduct had expired, Luther should be seized and held in durance until they should be informed how to deal with him.

Luther remained in the castle of Wartburg about ten months. He left it in March, 1522, and returned to Wittenberg in order to rebuke the excesses into which some of his former disciples had fallen. In 1524 he laid aside the monastic dress; and in 1525 he married Catharina von Bora, who had once been a nun. Luther completed his German version of the Old Testament in 1534; his translation of the New Testament had appeared in 1522. These translations, by their extensive circulation, as well as by the force and beauty of the language, have exerted a most important influence upon German literature, which may almost be said to date its origin from their composition.

Frederick the Wise, Luther's faithful friend and protector, died in 1525, and was succeeded by his nephew John, who was an open and devoted adherent of the great Reformer. During the latter portion of his life, Luther was held in the highest consideration by most of the princes of Germany, where his doctrines continued to spread, and finally, even during his lifetime, extended to Moravia, Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden. He died at Eisleben, the 18th of February, 1546, in the sixty-third year of his age. Among Luther's voluminous works, his translation of the Bible, already mentioned, is the most important. Besides his controversial writings, he has left numerous letters, sermons, etc. His "Table-Talk," ("Tischreden,") which is, says Carlyle, "the most interesting now of all the books proceeding from him," consists of sayings and anecdotes collected by Luther's friends after his death.

Although the character of Luther was especially distinguished by ardent zeal and unconquerable courage, yet on important occasions he could exercise the greatest moderation as well as discretion. The intrepidity with which he faced the dangers that threatened him at Worms is not more deserving of our praise than the admirable prudence and tact which he displayed in his defence on that memorable occasion. The fierce invective and coarse vituperation for which his controversial writings have been censured, are palliated by the consideration that such was the almost universal custom of that age. If his opposition was violent, it was not malignant or unforgiving. When his bitterest enemy, Tetzel,—the man who had excited Luther's fiercest indignation,—was in misfortune and disgrace, forsaken by all his friends, he received from his generous adversary a letter of condolence and consolation. As a reformer, Luther sought to introduce such changes only as he deemed to be imperatively demanded; and to the last he clung to some of the doctrines of his early faith which were rejected by all or nearly all the other Protestants. He was always an advocate of peace where peace could be had without the sacrifice of any great principle; and, so long as he lived, he steadfastly opposed, both by his counsels and by his influence, those religious contests which after his death desolated Germany.

"Justification by Faith" formed the great central doctrine in Luther's system of theology, as unconditional election and reprobation was the central idea of that of Calvin. The great aim of the latter would seem to have been to prove the utter and absolute helplessness of man; and, in the march of his inexorable logic, he sometimes appears equally regardless of the hopes of mankind and of the justice of God. Luther, while ascribing everything in the act of conversion to the grace of God, seems not so completely to close the door to human aspirations,—taking for his motto, "If thou canst believe —all things are possible to him that believeth."

Luther is described as a man of low stature but handsome person, with a lively complexion and falcon eyes. His voice was clear and of great power. On beholding his picture, Melanchthon is said to have exclaimed, "Each one of thy words was a thunderbolt!" ("Fulmina erant singula verba tua.") Carlyle says of him, "No more valiant man ever lived in that Teutonic kindred whose character is valour: the thing he will quail before exists not on this earth or under it." "He was," observes Heine, "not only the greatest, but the most German, man of our history. In his character all the faults and all the virtues of the Germans are combined on the largest scale. He had qualities which are very seldom found united, which we are accustomed to regard as irreconcilable antagonisms. . . . He was not only the tongue, but the sword, of his time. Sometimes he was wild as the storm that uproots the oak, and again he was as gentle as the zephyr which dallies with the violet." In a not dissimilar strain, Carlyle contrasts the wild, unconquerable energy with the affectionate tenderness of Luther's character: "A most gentle heart withal, full of pity and love, as, indeed, the truly valiant heart ever is." Alluding to Luther's fondness for music, he adds, "Death-defiance on the one hand, and such love of music on the other,—between these two, all great things had room."

Those who may desire to see a less favourable view of the great Reformer's character and influence, are referred to the article "Luther" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," from the pen of the editor, Dr. Hoefer.

Luther, (Paul,) a chemist, son of the preceding, was born at Wittenberg in 1533. He became physician to Augustus, Elector of Saxony, and to his successor, Christian. Died at Leipsic in 1593.

Luther, (Karl Theodor Robert,) a German astronomer, born April 16, 1822. He discovered twenty small planets or asteroids between 1852 and 1875.

Lutherburg. See Loutherbourg.

Luti, loo'tee, or Lutti, loot'tee, (Benedetto,) an excellent Italian painter of history, born at Florence in 1666, was a pupil of Gabbiani. He worked chiefly in Rome, and was patronized by Clement XI. According to Lanzi, many connoisseurs designated him the last master of the Florentine school. Among his merits are forms delicate and graceful, and a skilful distribution of colours and shadows. He painted in oil, in fresco, and in pastel. Among his master-pieces are an "Annunciation," "San Ranieri taking the Habit," and "The Prophet Isaiah," in the Lateran. Died in 1724.

Lutke, loot'ḳĕh, (Feodor Petrovitch,) a Russian navigator and explorer, born at Saint Petersburg in 1797. In 1821 he was commissioned to explore Kamschatka, in 1822–24 he made several voyages in the Arctic regions, and in 1826–28 he commanded an exploring expedition round the world, in which he was accompanied by a scientific staff. He was made an admiral in 1856, and a count in 1866. Died in August, 1882.

Luton, lü'tôN', (Louis,) a French chemist and painter on glass, born in Paris in 1757; died in 1852.

Luttrell, Colonel. See Wilkes, (John.)

Lut'trẹll, (Henry,) an English poet, wit, and man of fashion, born in 1770. He is said to have been a natural son of Lord Carhampton. He published "Advice to Julia, a Letter in Rhyme," (1820,) and "Crockford House," (1827,) but was best known as a brilliant talker in London society. Died in 1851.

Lut'trẹll, (Narcissus,) an English political writer, who kept a diary of public events during the Revolution of 1688 and subsequent years, which Macaulay often quotes and calls a valuable manuscript. Died about 1732. His diary was published in 1857.

See "North British Review" for November, 1857.

Lutz, loots, (Wilhelm Meyer,) a German musician and composer, born at Männerstadt, Kissingen, in 1829. In 1848 he went to England, where he has since resided. He has produced many operas and operettas, chief among which are "Faust and Marguerite," (1855,) "Zaida," (1868,) "Legend of the Lys," (1873,) etc.

Lützelburger or Luetzelburger, lüt'sẹl-bo͝oRG'ẹr, sometimes erroneously written Leutzelburger, (Hans,) also called Hans Frank, a Swiss wood-engraver, of whom very little is known, lived about 1520–40. Among the most important works attributed to him is the "Dance of Death," (usually ascribed to Holbein,) "Illustrations of the Old Testament," a portrait of Erasmus, and "The Sale of Indulgences."

See Nagler, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Lützow or Luetzow, lüt'so, (Ludwig Adolf Wilhelm,) a Prussian general, born in 1782. In 1813 he commanded a free corps of "black chasseurs" against the French. Died at Berlin, December 6, 1834.

Lützow, von, fon lüt'so, (THERESA VON STRUVE,) MADAME, a German authoress, born at Stuttgart in 1804. She wrote several novels and books of travel. Died in Java in 1852.

Luvigini, loo-ve-jee'nee, Luisini, loo-e-see'nee, or Luisino, loo-e-see'no, [Lat. LUISI'NUS,] (FRANCESCO,) an Italian scholar, born at Udine in 1523. He was preceptor of the son of Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma. Among his works is a "Latin Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry," (1554.) His poetical talent is praised by Muret and Giraldi. Died in 1568.

Luvigini or Luisino, (LUIGI,) a brother of the preceding, born at Udine, was a physician at Venice. Among his works is a version of the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, in Latin hexameters, (1552.)

Lux, lŏŏks, (ADAM,) a German republican, born at Mentz about 1770. He was sent to Paris in March, 1793, to solicit the annexation of his country to France. He witnessed with sympathy and admiration the conduct of Charlotte Corday at her execution. A few days later he published an apology for that heroine. For this and other offences he was executed in November, 1793.

Luxdorf, lŏŏks'dorf, (BOLLE WILLUM,) a Danish writer and lawyer, born in the island of Seeland in 1716. He cultivated Latin poetry with success. Died in 1788.

Luxembourg, lük'sŏn'boor', (CHRISTIAN LOUIS DE MONTMORENCI,) Prince de Tingri, a French general, born in Paris in 1675, was the fourth son of the great Marshal Luxembourg. For his services at Oudenarde and Lille (1708) he obtained the rank of lieutenant-general. He commanded at Ettlingen in 1734, and was made a marshal of France in the same year. From that time he was called MARSHAL DE MONTMORENCI. Died in 1746.

See PINARD, "Chronologie militaire."

Luxembourg, de, deh lük'sŏn'boor', (CHARLES FRANÇOIS FRÉDÉRIC DE MONTMORENCI,) MARSHAL, born in 1702, was a grandson of the first Marshal Luxembourg. He was aide-de-camp of Louis XV. in the war of 1741, and, having served with distinction in Germany, became a marshal of France. He gave a home to J. J. Rousseau at Montmorenci. (See the notice of his wife, below.) Died in 1764.

See ROUSSEAU, "Confessions."

Luxembourg, de, written also Luxemburg, (FRANÇOIS HENRI DE MONTMORENCI,) DUC, a celebrated marshal of France, born in Paris in 1628, was a son of the Count de Montmorenci-Bouteville, and a cousin-german of the great Prince de Condé. For his conduct at Lens in 1648 he was made maréchal-de-camp. From devotion to the Prince of Condé, he served several campaigns against France between 1653 and 1659, during which period Condé commanded the Spanish army. Having received a pardon from the king in 1660, he married the heiress of the house of Luxembourg, and assumed that name. In 1672 he obtained command of an army which invaded Holland and took several towns. His skilful retreat from Utrecht to Charleroi in November, 1673, raised him to the rank of the first captains of that age. In 1674 he commanded the right wing of Condé's army at Senef, and in 1675 received a marshal's bâton. He gained victories over the allies in Flanders in the campaign of 1677, which was followed by a long peace. Having incurred the enmity of Louvois, he was confined in the Bastille fourteen months on a charge of sorcery. In 1690, Louis XIV., against whom Austria, Spain, and England had formed a coalition, gave the chief command of his army to Marshal Luxembourg, who, since the death of Turenne and Condé, was the ablest of his generals. He defeated the allies at Fleurus in 1690. In the campaign of 1691 he defeated William III. of England at the great battle of Steenkerke. He was victorious over the same enemy and leader at Neerwinden, or Landen, in 1693. He died in January, 1695, after which the army of Louis gained few victories. "Even the admirers of William III.," says Macaulay, "were forced to own that in the field he was not a match for Luxembourg," whose "judgment was clearest and surest when responsibility pressed heaviest on him and when difficulties gathered thickest around him." "He gained immense renown at William's expense; but he had not the art of improving a victory, while William, of all generals, was best qualified to repair a defeat." ("History of England," vol. iv. chap. xix.)

Luxembourg or Luxemburg, de, (LOUIS,) Comte de Saint-Pol, an ambitious French general, born in 1418. He fought against Louis XI. at Montlhéri about 1464, but was soon after won over by the high office of Constable of France, and married the queen's sister, Marie de Savoie. He was called the pivot of the principal intrigues of that time. His perfidy provoked Louis XI. and Charles the Bold to declare him their common enemy. He was beheaded in 1475.

Luxembourg, de, (MADELÈNE ANGÉLIQUE de Neufville-Villeroi—deh nuf'vèl' vèl'rwâ',) MARÉCHALE-DUCHESSE, born in 1707, was a granddaughter of Marshal Villeroi. She was married to Marshal C. F. de Luxembourg in 1750. About 1758 this couple gave Rousseau an asylum at Montmorenci. Rousseau has commemorated in his "Confessions" her charming conversation and liberality. Her rank and talents gave her great social influence in Paris. Died in 1787.

Luxembourg-Ligni, de, deh lük'sŏn'boor' lèn'ye', (WALERAN,) Comte de Saint-Pol, was born in 1355, of one of the most illustrious families of Europe. While fighting for the French king, he was taken prisoner by the English in 1374. He married Matilda, a sister of Richard II. of England. Having been chosen Constable of France in 1412, he defeated the Armagnacs in battle. Died in 1417.

Luxemburg. See LUXEMBOURG.

Luyken or Luycken, loi'ken, (JAN,) a Dutch engraver, born in 1649, lived in Amsterdam. He etched, after his own designs, many admired works, which display a fertile invention. The "Death of Coligny" is called his best production. Died in 1712.

Luynes or Luines, de, deh lü-èn', (CHARLES D'ALBERT,) DUC, the favourite of Louis XIII. of France, was born in Languedoc in 1578. As the companion of Louis in youth, he acquired an ascendency over him, and about 1616 he became his most powerful minister. His cupidity and ambition excited many enemies, among whom was the king's mother; but through his influence she was sent into exile. In 1621 he was appointed Constable of France, and declared war against the Huguenots. It appears that Louis had resolved to discard him; but before that purpose was effected Luynes died, in December, 1621. He was a brother of Marshal Chaulnes, noticed in this work.

Luynes, de, (HONORÉ THÉODORIC PAUL JOSEPH D'ALBERT,) DUC, a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1802, was a liberal patron of arts and sciences. He was admitted in 1830 into the Academy of Inscriptions, to which he contributed many valuable treatises on antiquities and medals. Died at Rome, December 14, 1867.

Luyts, loits, (JAN,) a Dutch philosopher and astronomer, born at Horn about 1660, became professor of physics at Utrecht. He was an opponent of the Cartesian philosophy. Died in 1721.

Luz, lüz, ? [Lat. LU'CIUS,] (LOUIS,) a Swiss Protestant theologian, born at Bâle in 1577. He wrote a "History of the Jesuits," (1626,) and other works. Died in 1642.

Luzac, lü'zâk', (ELIAS,) a Dutch philosopher and jurist, born near Leyden in 1723. He published in 1756 "Researches into the Principles of Human Knowledge." His "Riches of Holland," (1778,) a history of Dutch commerce, is highly esteemed. Died in 1796.

Luzac, (JAN,) a philologist and publicist of great merit, born at Leyden in 1746. He practised law in his native place. In 1775 he became chief editor of the "Gazette de Leyde." From 1785 until 1796 he was professor of Greek in Leyden University. He corresponded with Washington and Jefferson, the former of whom wrote, "America is under great obligations to the writings and actions of such men as you." Among his works are "Socrates as a Citizen," ("De Socrate Cive,") dedicated to John Adams, of Massachusetts, and "Attic Readings," ("Lectiones Atticæ," 1809.) He was killed by an explosion of gunpowder at Leyden in 1807.

Luzac, (STEVEN,) the uncle of the preceding, was born at Leyden in 1706. He became in 1738 proprietor and editor of the "Gazette de Leyde," which is described as a model of accuracy and wisdom, and possessed much historical value. Died in 1787.

Luzan, loo-thän′, (Don IGNACIO,) a Spanish critic, poet, and literary reformer, born at Saragossa in 1702. About 1750 he was appointed director of the mint, a councillor of state, and minister of commerce. To counteract the vicious poetical style of Gongora, he wrote his celebrated "Art of Poetry," ("La Poetica, o Reglas de la Poesia en general," 1737,) which is said to have been effectual in rectifying the national taste. He produced several admired poems, one of which is "The Judgment of Paris." Died in 1754.

Luzarches, de, deh lü′zȧrsh′, (ROBERT,) a French architect, designed the magnificent cathedral of Amiens, which was commenced in 1220 and finished in 1269.

Luzerne, de la, deh lȧ lü′zȧrn′, (ANNE CÉSAR,) CHEVALIER, a French diplomatist, born in Paris in 1741. In 1779 he was sent as minister to the United States, where he had much influence, and performed with credit the duties of a position which the absence of instructions made more responsible. He left the United States in 1783. He was ambassador from France to London from 1788 until his death, in September, 1791.

Luzerne, de la, (CÉSAR GUILLAUME,) a learned prelate, born in Paris in 1738, was a brother of the preceding. He became Bishop of Langres in 1770, and was elected to the States-General in 1789. He emigrated in 1791, returned in 1814, and was made a cardinal in 1817. Among his numerous works is "Considerations on Divers Points of Christian Morality," (5 vols., 1795.) Died in 1821.

Luzzatto, loot-sȧt′to, (PHILOXENE,) a Jewish linguist, a son of S. D. Luzzatto, was born at Triest, July 10, 1829. He mastered twelve or more languages, and published various treatises, chiefly on Sanscrit, Assyrian, and other ancient tongues. Died January 25, 1854.

Luzzatto, (SAMUEL DAVID,) a Jewish scholar, born at Triest, in Austria, August 22, 1800. In early life he wrote against the Cabbalists and published some volumes of Hebrew verse. In 1829 he was made professor of biblical literature in the Rabbinical College of Padua. He wrote various theological treatises, commentaries, etc., and left a nearly complete Italian version of the Old Testament. Died at Padua, September 30, 1865.

Lyæus, li-ee′us, [Gr. Λυαῖος, from λύω, to "free" or "loosen,"] a surname given to Bacchus, because he (wine) frees the mind from care; though some say it is because he loosens the limbs of his votaries, rendering them unable to walk. (See BACCHUS.)

Ly′all, (Sir ALFRED COMYNS,) K.C.B., an English writer, born at Coulston, Surrey, in 1835. He was educated at Eton, and at Haileybury College, was appointed home secretary in India in 1873, foreign secretary in 1878, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces in 1882, and a member of the Council of India in 1888. He published "Asiatic Studies," (1882,) "Rise of the British Dominion in India," (1893,) etc., and is a singularly able and original writer in prose and verse.

Ly′all, (EDNA,) the pen-name of Ada Ellen Bayley, a novelist, born at Brighton, England. Among her works are "Donovan," (1882,) with its sequel, "We Two," (1884,) "Knight-Errant," (1887,) "To Right the Wrong," (1893,) etc.

Lycambes. See ARCHILOCHUS.

Ly-cā′on, [Gr. Λυκάων,] a fabulous king of Arcadia, and a son of Pelasgus. He and his numerous sons were notorious for impiety and cruelty. The poets feigned that Jupiter in disguise once visited Lycaon, who offered him human flesh to eat, for which offence he was changed into a wolf.

Lycius, lish′e-us, [Λύκιος,] a Greek sculptor, born in Bœotia, lived about 425 B.C. According to Pliny, he was a pupil of Myron.

Lycomède. See LYCOMEDES.

Lycomède, le′ko′mȧd′, the assumed name of GIUSEPPE MARIA ARRIGHI, (ȧr-ree′gee,) a Corsican writer, born in 1768. He published, in Italian, a "Historical Essay on the Civil and Political Revolutions of the Kingdom of Naples," (3 vols., 1812.) Died in 1834.

Lȳc-o-me′dēs, [Gr. Λυκομήδης; Fr. LYCOMÈDE, le′ko′mȧd′,] a king of Scyros and of the Dolopians, was the father of Deidamia, who became the mother of Pyrrhus by Achilles. The poets relate that young Achilles was committed to his care by Thetis to prevent him from going to the Trojan war. Lycomedes is said to have murdered Theseus, who sought refuge at his court.

Lycomedes, [Gr. Λυκομήδης,] an Arcadian general, was one of the founders of Megalopolis, (370 B.C.) He defeated the Spartans in 369, and took Pellene. He was murdered about 366 B.C.

Lȳ′con, [Λύκων,] an Athenian orator, who acquired notoriety as one of the accusers of Socrates. He was banished with Anytus for this offence.

Lycon, a Greek philosopher, born at Laodicea, lived about 300 B.C. He was the successor of Strato, and for about forty years was the head of the Peripatetic school of Athens. He had a high reputation for eloquence.

See RITTER, "History of Philosophy."

Lȳc′o-phron, [Λυκόφρων,] a Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He lived at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in Alexandria, from 280 to 250 B.C. He was one of the seven poets who were styled the "Pleiades." The numerous tragedies which he wrote have all been lost, but his lyric poem called "Cassandra," or "Alexandra," has come down to us. It is very obscure and enigmatical, but is admired as a prodigy of learning and valued as a treasury of facts and traditions.

See OSIANDER, "Bemerkungen zu Lycophron," 1826; FABRICIUS, "Bibliotheca Græca;" VOLKER, "De Lycophronis Cassandra," 1820; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Ly-cor′tas [Λυκόρτας] of Megalopolis, an Achæan general, was the father of Polybius the historian, and a friend of Philopœmen. He was sent as ambassador to Rome in 189 B.C. Died after 168 B.C.

Lycosthenes, le-kos′thȧ-nēs, (CONRAD,) the Greek name of CONRAD WOLFFHART, a scholar, born in Alsace in 1518. He became minister of a church in Bâle in 1545, and published a curious work on "Prodigies," ("Prodigiorum Chronicon,") a new edition of Gesner's "Bibliotheca," and other works. Died in 1561.

Ly-cur′gus, [Gr. Λυκοῦργος; Fr. LYCURGUE, le′kürg′,] in classic mythology, a king of Thrace, who is said to have been a persecutor of Bacchus, and to have been punished with madness. According to another tradition, Jupiter deprived him of sight.

Lycurgus, [Gr. Λυκοῦργος; Fr. LYCURGUE, le′kürg′; Ger. LYKURGUS, le-kōōr′gōōs,] a famous Spartan lawgiver, who belongs to the period anterior to authentic history. Plutarch begins his biography with the remark that nothing certain can be said concerning him. According to Aristotle, he lived more than 850 years B.C. He is supposed to have been the son of King Eunomus, who was succeeded by another son, Polydectes. At the death of the latter, Lycurgus refused the crown, and defended the right of Charilaus, a posthumous son of Polydectes. He visited many foreign countries, whose institutions he studied, and, after a long absence, returned to Sparta, where he made social and political changes of the most radical kind. His constitution was considered by the Greeks as the model of a perfect aristocracy, but contained a strong democratic element. The executive power was divided between two persons called kings. A remarkable feature in his system was the equal division or community of property, which existed to an extent unequalled in any other country in ancient or modern times. The interference of the state with domestic affairs and relations was carried to a great excess. His laws were based on the idea that men are made for the government, rather than the government for men. He is said to have prohibited the use of gold and silver money, and abolished all professions among the Spartans except that of arms, assigning all mechanical and menial employment to the slaves, (Helots,) who appear to have been treated with great severity. Having imposed on the people an oath that they would not alter his laws during his absence, he went into voluntary exile, from which he never returned. Tradition informs us that he vanished mysteriously from the earth. The Spartans erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. According to one legend, he ordered his ashes to be cast into the sea after his death, fearing that if his body were conveyed to Sparta the Spartans might think themselves absolved from their oath.

Lycurgus, an eminent Athenian orator and an able financier, was born about 400 B.C. He is said to have studied philosophy under Plato, and eloquence under Isocrates. For about fifteen years he presided over the public revenue with a high reputation for integrity and financial ability. In the contest with Philip of Macedon he supported the democratic party. He was one of the orators whom Alexander required Athens to deliver up to him in 335 B.C. This demand was firmly refused. Fifteen of his orations were extant in the time of Plutarch, and only one (that against Leocrates) has come down to us. His style is noble rather than elegant. Died in 323 B.C.

Lyd'deker, (RICHARD,) an English naturalist, born in 1849. He graduated at Cambridge, and was on the staff of the Geological Survey of India 1874–82, during which he made a special study of the vertebrate fossils of the Siwalik Hills. He wrote numerous works on natural history and geology, and was editor and chief author of the "Royal Natural History." Among his works are "Horses and Hoofs," "The Deer of All Lands," "Phases of Animal Life," etc.

Lyde. See JOYNER, (WILLIAM.)

Lȳd'gate, (JOHN,) an old English poet, born about 1375, became a monk of the abbey of Bury Saint Edmund's. He was ordained a priest in 1397, after which he travelled on the continent. On his return, he opned at the abbey above named a school, in which he taught languages, rhetoric, and versification. He acquired a high reputation as a poet. Among his numerous works are "The Story of Thebes," "The Fall of Princes," and the "History, Siege, and Destruction of Troy." Died about 1460.

See WARTON, "History of English Poetry."

Lȳd'ī-at, (THOMAS,) an English chronologer and mathematician, was born at Okerton in 1572. He became rector of Okerton about 1612. During the civil war he suffered persecution for his loyalty to Charles I., and he died very poor in 1646. His adversities are commemorated in these verses of Dr. Johnson:

> "If dreams yet flatter, once again attend:
> Hear Lydiat's life and Galileo's end."

Among his works (in Latin) are a Censure of Scaliger's Chronology, ("Emendatio Temporum contra Scaligerum," 1609,) "The Period of the Sun and Moon," and "The Measurement of the Solar Year."

Lȳ'dus, a son of Atys and Callithea, was the supposed ancestor of the ancient Lydians.

Lydus, [Gr. Λυδός,] the surname of JOANNES LAURENTIUS, [Ἰωάννης Λαυρέντιος,] a Greek historical writer, born at Philadelphia, in Lydia, about 490 A.D. He was employed many years in various official functions in the imperial palace at Constantinople. He resigned his offices about 550, and afterwards wrote many works, some of which are lost. An important treatise, "On the Magistrates of the Roman Republic," is still extant.

Lye, lī, (EDWARD,) an English philologist and clergyman, born at Totness in 1704. Soon after he left college he obtained the living of Houghton Parva, and in 1750 became vicar of Yardley Hastings. He acquired distinction by his researches into the Saxon language and literature. In 1743 he published the "Etymologicon Anglicanum," which Francis Junius had left in manuscript. His chief work is his "Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Dictionary," (1772.) Died in 1767.

Lyell, (Sir CHARLES,) an eminent British geologist, son of a botanist, was born at Kinnordy, in Forfarshire, in November, 1797. He graduated at Oxford in 1821, and studied law, but soon relinquished the practice of that profession in order to devote his time to geology. About 1826 he began to contribute to the "Transactions of the Geological Society" a series of papers which display superior powers of observation and comparison, and in 1830 published the first volume of his important work, "Principles of Geology," (3 vols., 1830–33,) which was very favourably received. It reached the fifth edition in 1837. He afterwards divided the work into two parts, one of which was published under the title of "Elements of Geology," (1838.) In a subsequent edition the name was changed to "Manual of Elementary Geology." It is generally admitted that his work contributed much to place geology on a philosophical basis as an inductive science. Having visited the United States in 1841, he lectured on geology at Boston, and after his return published "Travels in North America, with Geological Observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia," (2 vols., 1845.) He also wrote many treatises on the geology of America, which were printed in the "Transactions" of the Geological Society, and in other journals. In 1845 he made another excursion to the United States, the result of which was a "Second Visit to the United States," (2 vols., 1849.) Both of these books of travel contain much to interest the general reader. Mr. Lyell was knighted in 1848. He was elected president of the Geological Society in 1836, and again in 1850. He published in 1863 "The Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man, with Remarks on Theories of the Origin of Species by Variation." He was formerly prominent among the opponents of the "development" or Darwinian theory; but later in life he changed his views in that respect. Died February 22, 1875.

Lykurgos, le-koor'gos, (LOGOTHETIS,) a modern Greek patriot, born in the island of Samos in 1772. Lȳnd'hurst, (JOHN SINGLETON COPLEY,) LORD, an eminent English statesman, born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1772, was the son of the distinguished painter John S. Copley, who took him to England about 1775. He was educated at Cambridge, and chose the profession of law. Having gradually risen to be the leader of the Midland circuit, he was elected to Parliament as a Tory in 1818, and appointed solicitor-general in 1819, when he was also knighted. Sir John became attorney-general in 1824, and was returned to Parliament by the University of Cambridge in 1826. After opposing the bill for Catholic emancipation, he accepted the office of lord chancellor in the Liberal ministry of Canning in April, 1827, and was raised to the peerage, as Baron Lyndhurst. Having been retained in his office by the Duke of Wellington, he voted in concurrence with his colleagues for Catholic emancipation in 1829. In November, 1830, the Liberal party, under Earl Grey, came into power, and Lord Lyndhurst was deprived of the great seal; but in 1831 he was appointed chief baron of the exchequer. He made an able speech against the Reform bill in 1832. In the court of exchequer he displayed eminent judicial qualifications. He was again lord chancellor during the brief ministry of Sir Robert Peel in 1834. In August, 1841, Sir Robert became premier, and Lord Lyndhurst lord chancellor, of a new Conservative ministry, which was deprived of power by the triumph of the Whigs in 1846. After that date, until near his death, he was one of the most prominent orators of his party in the House of Lords. He advocated the prosecution of the Russian war (1854–56) in several eloquent speeches. Died in 1863.

Lȳ-san'dẹr, [Gr. Λύσανδρος; Fr. LYSANDRE, le'zôNdR'; Ger. LYSANDROS, le-zän'dros,] one of the ablest generals and statesmen of ancient Sparta, makes his first appearance in history near the close of the Peloponnesian war. In 407 B.C. he was chosen commander of the fleet, with which he gained a victory over the Athenians at Notium in that year. He made himself very popular with the Persian allies of Sparta, and he defeated the Athenian fleet in a decisive battle at Ægospotami in 405. In 404 he captured Athens, and changed its democracy into an oligarchy ruled by thirty archons, (usually called the Thirty Tyrants.) He was then the most powerful man in Greece, but soon found an able rival in Agesilaus, who became King of Sparta in 398 B.C. and thwarted his ambitious designs. Lysander meditated a revolution in Sparta by the abolition of hereditary royalty. Before his design was matured, he was appointed commander of an army sent against the Thebans, and was killed in battle at Haliartus in 395 B.C. In Plutarch's "Lives" Lysander is brought into comparison with the Roman Sulla.

Lyser, (MICHAEL,) a German anatomist, born at Leipsic about 1650. He published a good manual of anatomy, entitled "Culter Anatomicus," (1653.) He shares with Bartholin the honour of the discovery of the lymphatic vessels.

Lyser or Lyserus, (POLYCARP.) See LEYSER.

Lysias, lish'e-as, [Λυσίας,] one of the ten Athenian orators, was born at Athens in 458 B.C., and was the son of Cephalus, in whose house Plato placed the scene of his famous dialogue "On the Republic." From 443 until 411 he lived at Thurium, in Italy, from which he was expelled by the victorious Spartans at the latter date. He then returned to Athens, where his property was confiscated by the Thirty Tyrants, who would have put him to death if he had not escaped, 404 B.C. Soon after that date he united with Thrasybulus in the expulsion of the Thirty, and opened a school of rhetoric in Athens. His orations, amounting to more than two hundred, were mostly composed after his return to Athens, (411.) Thirty-four of these have come down to us. Lysias died at Athens about 378 B.C., leaving a high reputation as a writer of orations, only one of which, it is said, was spoken by him. His diction is eminently graceful, pure, and perspicuous. "He resembles," says Quintilian, "rather a pure fountain than a great river," ("puro fonti quam magno flumini propior.")

Lȳ-sic'ra-tēs, [Λυσικράτης,] an Athenian, who lived about 335 B.C., and whose name has been preserved by means of a beautiful choragic monument built for him at Athens. It has been commonly called "the Lantern of Demosthenes," from a tradition that he used it as a place of study.

Lȳ-sim'a-chus, [Gr. Λυσίμαχος; Fr. LYSIMAQUE, le'ze'măk',] King of Thrace, was born in Macedonia about 355 B.C. In his youth he was so distinguished for courage and strength that Alexander the Great chose him as one of his body-guards. In the division of provinces at the death of Alexander, (323,) Lysimachus obtained Thrace and some adjacent districts. In 315 he joined Seleucus, Cassander, and Ptolemy in a coalition against Antigonus. Lysimachus marched into Asia Minor, formed a junction with Seleucus, and fought a battle at Ipsus in 301 B.C., where Antigonus was defeated and killed. By this victory he acquired the northwestern part of Asia Minor. Demetrius of Macedon having been defeated and dethroned by the allied armies of Lysimachus, Pyrrhus, and Seleucus, the first annexed Macedon to his dominions in 286. He was soon after involved in a war with Seleucus, and was killed in battle at Corupedion in 281 B.C.

Lysippus, [Gr. Λύσιππος; Fr. LYSIPPE, le'zĕp',] a Greek statuary of great celebrity, was born at Sicyon, and flourished in the reign of Alexander the Great, about 330 B.C. He formed his style by the imitation of nature, without much respect to the conventionalities of the schools. His statues and groups, according to the best authorities, were some fifteen hundred in number, all or nearly all of which were of bronze. None of his works are known to be extant, though several well-authenticated copies are to be seen. Among his master-pieces, described by Pliny, Pausanias, and others, were colossal statues of Zeus and Hercules, a statue of Time or Opportunity, (Καιρός,) and several images of Alexander the Great, who is said to have issued an edict that no one should make his statue but Lysippus.

In 1743 he negotiated a secret treaty with Prussia against Austria. Among his numerous works are "Observations on the Romans," (1751,) and "Observations on the History of France," (1765.) Died in 1785.

Maboul, mȧ'bool', (JACQUES,) a French pulpit orator, Bishop of Alet, born in Paris about 1650; died in 1723.

Mabuse, mȧ'büz', or Maubeuge, mō'buzh', (JAN,) a famous Flemish painter, whose family name was GESSART or GASSAERT, was born at Maubeuge in 1499. He is said to have studied in Italy. He worked in Middelburg and in London, where he painted portraits of the royal family in the reign of Henry VIII., and historical pictures, which are still admired. Among his masterpieces was a "Descent from the Cross," which was destroyed by lightning at Middelburg, and "The Wise Men's Offering," now owned by the Earl of Carlisle. His habits were very intemperate and prodigal. Died about 1562.

Mac-ad'am, (JOHN LOUDON,) a Scottish surveyor, noted for his improvement in roads, born September 21, 1756. He lived in America, 1770–83, taking an active part against the colonies, and making and losing a fortune in the war. He constructed the first macadamized roads, near Bristol, about 1815, and explained his system in his "Essay on the Scientific Repair and Preservation of Public Roads," (1819.) In 1827 he was made general surveyor of the metropolitan roads, and afterwards received a grant of £10,000 for his services. Died in 1836.

Macaire. See MACARIUS.

Mac-al'ister, (ALEXANDER,) anatomist, born at Dublin, Ireland, in 1844. He was professor of zoology at Dublin in 1869, of anatomy in 1873, and of anatomy at Cambridge in 1883. He published "Morphology of Vertebrate Animals," (1878,) "Some Morphological Lessons taught by Human Variation," (1894,) etc.

Mac-Al'ister, (JAMES,) an American educator, born at Glasgow, Scotland, in 1840. He was superintendent of public schools at Milwaukee 1874–81, at Philadelphia 1883–91, and president of the Drexel Institute, Philadelphia, after 1891.

Mac-Ar'dell, (JAMES,) an excellent English engraver in mezzotinto, born about 1710. He engraved portraits of many eminent contemporaries, and subjects after Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Murillo, and other masters. Among his works are "Moses on the Nile," after Van Dyck, and an "Assumption," after Murillo. Died in 1765. Of MacArdell Basan observes that he "was one of the best engravers in mezzotinto that England ever produced."

Macarel, mȧ'kȧ'rĕl', (LOUIS ANTOINE,) a French jurist, born at Orléans in 1790. He published, besides other works, "Elements of Administrative Jurisprudence," (1818.) Died in 1851.

Mą-cā'rĭ-us, [Gr. Μακάριος; Fr. MACAIRE, mȧ'kȧr',] an eminent ascetic or hermit of Egypt, born about 300 A.D., has been canonized as a saint by the Catholic Church. Fifty extant Greek homilies are ascribed to him. Died about 390 A.D.

Another SAINT MACARIUS, called Junior, lived at Alexandria in the fourth century, and was noted for his ascetic piety. He is supposed to be the author of a work called the "Rule of Saint Macarius."

Mac-Ar'thur, (ARTHUR,) an American general, born in Massachusetts, and served in the civil war, advancing from first lieutenant to brevet colonel. After the war he entered the regular army as first lieutenant, reaching the rank of lieutenant-colonel in May, 1896. In the war with Spain he was made successively brigadier- and major-general of volunteers, took part in the conflict in the Philippines, and in the spring of 1900 succeeded General Otis as military governor of the Philippine Islands.

Mąc-ar'thur, (DUNCAN,) an American soldier and statesman, born in Dutchess county, New York, in 1772. He served in the war of 1812, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. He was elected Governor of Ohio in 1830. Died in 1840.

MacArthur, (JOHN,) a distinguished architect, born at Bladenoch, in Wigtonshire, Scotland, May 13, 1823, came to Philadelphia when only ten years of age. He learned the business of a carpenter, and studied drawing and architecture in the evenings. In 1848 he was awarded the first premium for his plan of a new House of Refuge, besides which, among the prominent buildings erected by him in Philadelphia, are the Continental Hotel and Jayne's splendid mansion at Nineteenth and Chestnut streets. He was architect for the war department during the war, and after its close for the navy department, for which he built the Naval Hospital at Philadelphia, but he regarded the new City Hall there as the crowning work of his life. Died January 8, 1890.

Mąc-art'ney, (GEORGE,) EARL OF, a statesman, of Scottish descent, born near Belfast, Ireland, in 1737. He was elected to Parliament in 1768, and appointed chief secretary for Ireland in 1769. In 1775 he was chosen Governor of the island of Granada, which the French captured from him in 1779. From December, 1780, to 1786, he was Governor of Madras. He was appointed Governor-General of India, as successor to Warren Hastings, but declined on account of ill health. His most remarkable public service was his embassy to China, where he arrived in August, 1793, being the first English ambassador to that court. He refused to prostrate himself before the emperor, according to Chinese etiquette. Though he failed to obtain a commercial treaty, he maintained his reputation as an able negotiator. He was raised to the peerage as a baron in 1776, and was made Earl of Macartney in 1794. He died in 1806, after which appeared a "Journal of the Embassy to China in 1792–94."

Macaulay, mą-kaw'le, (CATHARINE,) an English authoress, whose maiden name was SAWBRIDGE, was born in Kent in 1733. She was married to Dr. George Macaulay, of London, about 1760, and published a "History of England from the Accession of James I. to the Elevation of the House of Hanover," (1763,) which is favourable to republicanism. In 1785 she visited Washington at Mount Vernon. She wrote several political treatises. "Her history," says T. B. Macaulay,

"is more distinguished by zeal than either by candour or skill." Died in 1791.

See WILKES, "Life and Letters;" "Monthly Review" for March 1765, May, 1769, and August, 1771.

Macaulay, (THOMAS BABINGTON,) BARON, an eminent English scholar, critic, and historian, was born at Rothley Temple, in Leicestershire, October 25, 1800. His father, Zachary Macaulay, was a native of Scotland, of Highland descent; his mother, Selina Mills, the daughter of a bookseller of Bristol, was of a Quaker family. His home education was religious and somewhat austere. Mrs. Hannah More, who was intimate with his parents, has given in her letters many interesting particulars of the future historian. From his earliest childhood he was passionately fond of poetry,—so much so that he could hardly be prevailed on to read prose. Later, however, we find him deeply interested in history, and warmly discussing with a friend of his own age the respective merits of Marlborough and other eminent commanders. (See "Letters of Hannah More to Zachary Macaulay, containing Notices of Lord Macaulay's Youth," 1860.)

When about twelve years of age, he was placed under the instruction of Mr. Preston, with whom he laid the foundations of his acquaintance with the classics. At eighteen he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself, having twice won the chancellor's medal for English verse,—the first time for a poem on "Pompeii," in 1819, the second for one on "Evening," in 1820. He graduated as B.A. in 1822, and soon after was chosen a Fellow of his college. He studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and was admitted to the bar in 1826. "The Battle of Ivry," one of the most universally admired of his shorter poems, was published in "Knight's Quarterly Magazine" in 1824. In 1825 he contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" an article on Milton, which at once placed him in the foremost rank of the most distinguished essayists of the age. This was the commencement of that splendid and fascinating series of review-articles, the publication of which may be said to form an era in the history of literature, when for the first time the critical or historic essay threatened to bear away the palm of popularity from the most brilliant works of fiction.

Macaulay entered Parliament in 1830, as a representative of the borough of Calne. While at Cambridge he had distinguished himself as an orator, and he now more than justified the high expectations which his friends had formed of his parliamentary career. His speeches on the Reform bill (in 1830–32) established his fame as an able and eloquent speaker. It is said, however, that, owing to his rapid and somewhat monotonous delivery, his speeches were more effective and convincing when they appeared in print than when spoken in the House of Commons. One of his most remarkable efforts was his great speech (1833) on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the East India Company. He was soon after made a member of the supreme council of India, and placed at the head of the law commission to prepare a new code for the government of that country. Although it was found impossible to carry into immediate effect many of the reforms which he sought to introduce, his efforts in this cause have not been without important results. Since the government of India was transferred to the imperial crown, his code has been made the basis of the legal system of the country. His sojourn in India (from 1835 to 1838) had made him acquainted with its history and with the character of its various peoples; and to the knowledge thus acquired in a field hitherto untrodden by him, we are indebted for two of his most effective and most brilliant essays,—those on Clive and Warren Hastings.

Having returned to England in 1838, he again entered Parliament, as a representative of the city of Edinburgh, and soon after received the appointment of secretary at war in the Melbourne ministry. On the fall of the Whigs in 1841, he went into the opposition. When they returned to power in 1846, he was made paymaster-general. He had been regularly re-elected from Edinburgh until 1847, when, owing to an unusual combination of different party elements, he was defeated. The mortification of this repulse stung him very deeply. He resolved to devote the remainder of his life to studious retirement. He seems to have felt, indeed, that his proper vocation was the pursuit of literature, apart from the excitements of the political arena. One of the important results of his withdrawal from public life was his being able to apply himself without interruption to the composition of his great work, the "History of England," the first two volumes of which made their appearance near the close of 1848. Never before in the annals of literature was any work of history welcomed by the public with such enthusiastic admiration. His work was read by tens of thousands with as much eagerness and delight as a fresh novel by Scott or Bulwer would have been. In 1849 Macaulay was chosen lord rector of the University of Glasgow. Not long after, in a speech which he made in that city, he took a formal leave of political life, explaining at the same time the principles by which he had sought to guide his course while he was connected with the government. Among other things, he said on that occasion, "I cannot accuse myself of having ever been untrue either to the cause of civil or religious liberty, or to the cause of property and law. I reflect with pleasure that I bore a part in some of those reforms which corrected great abuses and removed just discontents. I reflect with equal pleasure that I never stooped to the part of a demagogue, and never feared to confront what seemed to me to be an unreasonable clamour." In 1852 the people of Edinburgh, as some atonement for the injustice which they felt had been done him five years before, again returned Macaulay to Parliament, without his having so much as offered himself as a candidate or having made the smallest effort to procure his re-election. Although he took his seat in the House of Commons, his declining health did not permit him to take any active part in the debates. During the whole time that he was in the House he spoke but twice: on both occasions he was listened to with the most respectful and eager attention. An imperfect and extremely inaccurate collection of his speeches having been printed without his sanction, a correct edition was by his authority issued in 1854. In 1856, on account of ill health, he resigned his seat in Parliament. In 1855 the third and fourth volumes of his History made their appearance. They were welcomed as warmly and read as eagerly as the two former had been. It was his original purpose to bring his History from the accession of James II. down to a time within the memory of persons still living. But in the last volume he had only reached the peace of Ryswick, in 1697. After his decease another fragmentary volume was published, including an account of the death of William III.

In 1857 Macaulay was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Macaulay of Rothley. Although his health continued to decline, he still applied himself to his literary labours until very near the time of his death. His disease was an affection of the heart, of which he died suddenly on the 28th of December, 1859.

Besides the various productions of his pen already referred to, he contributed a series of valuable biographies to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Not content with his acknowledged mastery in the different departments of prose, he became again in 1842 a candidate for poetic laurels, and gave to the world his "Lays of Ancient Rome," of which it is scarcely too much to say that, for a combination of picturesqueness, simplicity, and power, there is nothing of the kind superior to them in the English language.

It is, however, as a writer on history that the name of Macaulay is destined to take its most distinguished place and descend to the remotest posterity. Already, in his essays, he had proved his mastery in this department of composition. A perfect history, according to his ideal,* would not be content with merely recording wars and revolutions, the lives of kings and heroes, but would include literature and the arts, manners and usages, the progress of civilization,—in short, the whole life of the nation; not of the aristocracy only, but of the people in every rank and condition. Referring to Macaulay's historic essays, Dean Milman well observes, "The variety of topics is almost as nothing to the variety of information on every topic." Of the style he remarks, "It was eminently his own. . . . Its characteristics were vigour, animation, copiousness, clearness,—above all, sound English, now a rare excellence. . . . His English was pure both in idiom and in words; pure to fastidiousness; not that he discarded or did not make free use of the plainest and most homely terms, . . . but every word must be plain English,—nothing that approached real vulgarity, nothing that had not the stamp of popular use or the authority of sound English writers."

That Macaulay possessed in a pre-eminent degree many of the highest attributes of a great historian, none will deny. In that power of imagination by which he was enabled to clothe the dead past with all the activity and fulness of life, he was scarcely, if at all, inferior to the most gifted writers of fiction. In the extent and variety of his knowledge, in the quickness and strength of his intellect, by which he was able to grasp with facility the most difficult political and moral problems, in his thorough acquaintance with all the springs of human action, in the vividness of his descriptions, in the animation and sustained interest of his narrative, in the clearness, force, and brilliancy of his style, in his command, in short, over every species of eloquence, whether declamatory, argumentative, or poetical, he has, even among the greatest masters of historical composition, few, if any, superiors. He is, however, it must be confessed with regret, deficient in one important or rather essential qualification,—impartiality. His feelings were so intense, his attachments and aversions so strong, that, where these chanced to enter into the subject to be weighed, the balance was too seldom held with an equal hand.

Macaulay's great work has been compared to a vast painting, in which the different figures correspond to prominent historic characters. It may be said that as in his style he too often sacrifices simplicity to his love of antithesis, so in his history he is too apt to exaggerate, for the sake of effect, the lights and shadows of his portraits.

In relation to his conversational powers, Dean Milman observes, "In the quiet intercourse with the single friend, no great talker was more free, easy, and genial than Macaulay. There was the most equable interchange of thought; he listened with as much courtesy as he spoke with gentle and pleasant persuasiveness. In a larger circle, such as he delighted to meet and assemble around him to the close of his life, a few chosen intimates, some accomplished ladies, foreigners of the highest distinction who were eager to make his acquaintance, his manners were frank and open. In conversation in such a circle, a commanding voice, high animal spirits, unrivalled quickness of apprehension, a flow of language as rapid as inexhaustible, gave him, perhaps, a larger share, but a share which few were not delighted to yield up to him. His thoughts were like lightning, and clothed themselves at once in words. . . . And the stores which his memory had at instantaneous command! . . . With these came anecdotes, touches of character, drollery, fun, excellent stories excellently told."

"Lord Macaulay," observes the same writer, "was never married; his strong domestic affections were chiefly centred in his sister—happily married to his friend Sir Charles Trevelyan—and her family. Her children were to him as his own, and cherished with almost parental tenderness. As a friend he was singularly steadfast. He was impatient of anything disparaging of one for whom he entertained a sincere esteem. In the war of political life he made, we believe, no lasting enemy; he secured the unswerving attachment of his political friends, to whom he had been unswervingly true."

All Macaulay's works have been reprinted in Germany. His "History" has been translated into French, the first two volumes by M. Jules de Peyronnet, the second and third by M. Amédée Pichot.

Macaulay, (ZACHARY,) F.R.S., an English philanthropist, of Scottish descent, born about 1768, was the father of Lord Macaulay, the historian. He was a zealous coadjutor of Wilberforce in the abolition of the slave-trade, in which cause he laboured many years. Died in 1838. His father, John Macaulay, minister at Inverary, is mentioned in Dr. Johnson's "Tour to the Hebrides."

Mac-Au'ley, (CATHERINE E.,) an Irish lady, eminent for benevolence and piety, born in the county of Dublin in 1787. She was educated a Catholic. Having lost her parents in early life, she was adopted by Mr. Callahan, a wealthy gentleman, who at his death, in 1822, left her his entire fortune. She founded in 1827, in Baggot Street, Dublin, an institution designed as a temporary home for poor women out of employment, and a school for children. It was afterwards called the Institute of Our Blessed Lady of Mercy, having for its object the care of the sick. She became in 1831 superior of the Order of the Sisters of Mercy. This order has been introduced into Great Britain, the United States, Australia, and South America. Died in 1841.

See "Life of Catherine MacAuley," by a member of the Order of Mercy, New York, 1866.

Mac-bĕth' or Macbéda, mak-bā'tha, a king of Scotland, who, according to the common tradition, was a cousin of King Duncan, and originally Thane of Glamis. About 1040 Macbeth assassinated Duncan and usurped the throne. Malcolm, the lawful heir, fled to England, and, having returned with an army, defeated Macbeth, who was killed in 1056 or 1057.

The story of Macbeth's usurpation would seem to possess scarcely any positive historic basis. "However he may have gained his power," says Burton, "he exercised it with good repute, according to the reports nearest to his time. It is among the most curious of the antagonisms that sometimes separate the popular opinion of people of mark from anything positively known about them, that this man, in a manner sacred to splendid infamy, is the first whose name appears in the ecclesiastical records both as a king of Scotland and a benefactor of the Church. . . . He had a wider dominion than any previous ruler, having command over all the country now known as Scotland, except the isles and a portion of the western highlands." ("History of Scotland," vol. i. chap. x.) The legend of Macbeth forms the subject of one of Shakspeare's most celebrated tragedies.

Mac-Brīde', (DAVID,) an eminent surgeon, born in the county of Antrim, Ireland, in 1726, settled in Dublin in 1749. Besides other works, he published an "Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine," (1772,) which is much esteemed. Died in 1778.

Maccabæus, (JUDAS.) See JUDAS.

Mac-Cābe', (EDWARD,) an Irish cardinal, born at Dublin, February 14, 1816, was bred at Maynooth, and made a priest in 1839. In 1877 he became bishop and assistant to Cardinal Cullen, to whom he had for several years been a vicar-general. In 1879 he became Archbishop of Dublin, and in 1882 he was created a cardinal-priest. Died at Kingstown, Ireland, February 10, 1885.

MacCabe, (WILLIAM BERNARD,) an Irish journalist, born in Dublin, November 23, 1801. For many years he was connected with the press of Dublin and London, and was (1847–51) Uruguayan consul at London. Besides various books translated from the Italian and German, he published a "Catholic History of England," (1848–54,) novels entitled "Bertha," (1851,) "Florine," "Agnes Arnold," (1860,) "Adelaide," etc., and other works. Died December 14, 1891.

Mac'ca-bees, [Gr. Μακκαβαῖοι; Fr. MACCABÉES, mȧ'kȧ'bȧ',] a celebrated Jewish family, which attained the royal dignity in Judea. The surname MACCABÆUS, from the Hebrew Makkab, a "hammer," was first given to Judas for his victories over the King of Syria, about 165 B.C. His family and descendants were also called Maccabees or Asmonæans. Judas, who was the son of Mattathias, had three brothers, John, Simon, and Jonathan, noticed in this work.

Mac-Câll', (GEORGE A.,) an American general, born in Philadelphia in 1802, graduated at West Point in 1822. He took command of a division or corps called the Pennsylvania Reserves, about May, 1861, and commanded the same at Mechanicsville and Gaines's Mill, June 26–27, 1862. He was taken prisoner June 30 of that year. Died in February, 1868.

Mac-Car'thy, (DENIS FLORENCE,) an Irish author, born at Cork in 1820. He was appointed professor of poetry in the Catholic University of Dublin, and in 1871 was made the recipient of a literary pension of one hundred pounds per annum. Among his works are translations from Calderon's dramas, (1853,) "Ballads, Poems, and Lyrics," (1850,) "Under-Glimpses," (1857,) "The Bell-Founder, and other Poems," (1857,) "Shelley's Early Life," (1872,) etc. He also edited a "Book of Irish Ballads," (1846.) Died April 7, 1882.

MacCarthy, (JUSTIN,) an Irish author, born at Cork November 22, 1830. He received a good education, and became a journalist of Liverpool (1853) and London, (1860.) He passed several years in the United States. In 1879 he was returned to Parliament as a Home-Ruler, representing the county of Longford, and in 1880 was re-elected with no opposition. Among his works are "The Waterdale Neighbours," (1867,) "My Enemy's Daughter," (1869,) "Lady Judith," (1871,) "A Fair Saxon," (1873,) "Linley Rochford," (1874,) "Dear Lady Disdain," (1875,) "Miss Misanthrope," (1877,) "Con Amore," (1881,) "A History of Our Own Times," a work of much merit (1878–80,) "History of the Four Georges," (1884,) "Sir Robert Peel," (1891,) "The Riddle Ring," (a novel, 1896,) and "Mr. Gladstone," (1897.)

MacCarthy, (JUSTIN HUNTLY,) son of the preceding, was born in 1862. He was a Nationalist member of Parliament 1884–92, and the author of "England under Gladstone," (1884,) "Ireland since the Union," (1889,) "The French Revolution," (1890,) "A London Legend," (1895,) etc.

MacCheyne, mak-shān', (ROBERT MURRAY,) a Scottish divine, born at Edinburgh in 1813. He studied theology under Dr. Chalmers in the university of his native city, and in 1836 was ordained minister of Saint Peter's, Dundee. His earnest and faithful labours were instrumental in converting great numbers during the memorable revival of 1839. He died in 1843, leaving a number of hymns of great beauty.

Macchi, mâk'kee, (MAURO,) an Italian political writer, born at Milan in 1815. He was a moderate Liberal in politics. Died in 1880.

Macchiavelli or Machiavelli, de, dà mâ-ke-â-vel'-lee, often Anglicized as Machiavel, mak'e-a-vĕl, [Lat. MACHIAVEL'LUS; Fr. MACHIAVEL, mâ'she'â'vĕl',] (NICCOLÒ DI BERNARDO,) a famous Italian statesman, diplomatist, and writer, whose character abounds in enigmas and paradoxes, and from whose name has been derived a synonym of perfidious policy, (Machiavellism.) He was born at Florence on the 3d of May, 1469. In 1499 he was appointed secretary of the Ten who managed the diplomatic affairs of the republic. He retained this office about fourteen years, during which he was employed in many foreign missions to France, etc., and acquitted himself with great dexterity. In 1510, for the third time, he was sent to France, and negotiated an alliance with Louis XII. He zealously exerted his talents and influence to maintain the independence of Florence, but without success. In 1512 the Medicis obtained sovereign power in Florence by the aid of the pope and the emperor, and Machiavelli was banished from the city, but forbidden to leave the country. He passed several ensuing years in retirement, and during this period composed a treatise on the "Art of War," and his important work entitled "The Prince," ("Del Principe," or "De Principatibus,") which has entailed a large portion of conventional infamy on his name. It was written for the private use of Lorenzo de' Medici, and not designed for publication. "Few books," says Hallam, "have been more misrepresented. His crime, in the eyes of the world, was to have cast away the veil of hypocrisy." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") About 1520 he was recalled into public service by Leo X., and was employed on several missions, the last of which was to the army of the league against Charles V., (1526.) He died at Florence in June, 1527. His last work was an excellent, luminous, and picturesque history of Florence, ("Storie Fiorentine," 1525,) the style of which is greatly admired. He was also author of several comedies of some merit, and of valuable "Discourses on Livy." "The character of Macchiavelli," says Macaulay, "was hateful to the new masters of Italy. His works were misrepresented by the learned, misconstrued by the ignorant, censured by the Church, abused with all the rancour of simulated virtue by the minions of a base despotism and the priests of a baser superstition. . . . The name of a man whose genius had illuminated all the dark places of policy, and to whose patriotic wisdom an oppressed people had owed their last chance of emancipation, passed into a proverb of infamy. . . . The terms in which he is commonly described would seem to import that he was the tempter, the evil principle, the discoverer of ambition and revenge, the original inventor of perjury," etc. "His History of Florence," says Hallam, "is enough to immortalize the name of Machiavel. Seldom has a more giant stride been made in any department of literature than by this judicious, clear, and elegant history." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Macchietti, mâk-ke-et'tee, (GIROLAMO,) an Italian painter, surnamed DEL CROCIFISSAJO, (kRO-che-fēs-sâ'yo,) (because, as we are told, his master painted crucifixes,) was born at Florence about 1540. He worked at Florence and Rome, and painted history and portraits with great success. Among his master-pieces was a picture of the "Adoration of the Magi."

Mac-Clel'lan, (GEORGE,) M.D., an eminent American surgeon, born at Woodstock, Windham county, Connecticut, in 1796. He graduated at Yale College in 1815, and studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1819. He founded about 1826 the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, in which he became professor of surgery and a very popular lecturer. He was one of the first in the United States to introduce the system of clinical instruction into the medical schools. He was particularly distinguished as a bold and successful surgical operator. Died in 1847.

MacClellan, (GEORGE BRINTON,) a distinguished American general, the son of the preceding, was born in Philadelphia, December 3, 1826. He entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1842, and graduated there in the summer of 1846, standing second in general rank in a large class. He served in the Mexican war as lieutenant of engineers in 1847, and was breveted captain for his services at the capture of Mexico. In the spring of 1855 the government sent to the seat of war in the Crimea a military commission to examine the military systems of the European powers, etc. Captain McClellan was one of the three officers selected for this mission. He returned home in April, 1856, and gave the results of his observations in a valuable report to the war department. He resigned his commission in the army in 1857, and was appointed chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad.

In May, 1861, he took command of the Union forces in Western Virginia, which defeated the enemy at Rich Mountain and Cheat River in July. A few days after the battle of Bull Run (July 21, 1861) he was, at the recommendation of General Scott, appointed commander of the army at Washington. He reorganized that army and brought it into a high state of discipline. When General Scott retired from active service, November 1, 1861, McClellan was appointed to the command of the armies of the United States. About the end of January, 1862, the President ordered that a general movement should be made by all the armies on the 22d of February. Having been relieved from the command of all the departments except that of the Potomac, McClellan began to move towards Richmond about the 10th of March. He conveyed his army by water down the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay to the mouth of James River. Soon after the opening of this campaign he began to complain that he was not properly supported by the President. He commenced active operations about the 5th of April, by the siege of Yorktown, which the insurgents evacuated on the 3d or 4th of May. On the next day he fought an indecisive battle at Williamsburg, from which he slowly followed the retiring enemy to the Chickahominy.

According to his biographer and admirer, Mr. Hillard, "the mind of McClellan was constantly burdened with a conviction that his troops were not numerous enough." He had about 95,000 men at Yorktown. The Union army was attacked at Fair Oaks on the 31st of May by General J. E. Johnston, who was repulsed with heavy loss. According to Hillard, McClellan was confined to bed by illness during this battle. His army remained nearly inactive in the swamps of the Chickahominy for about three weeks, during which he lost great numbers by sickness. Active hostilities were renewed by the enemy on the 26th of June, and then began the Seven Days' battles, at Mechanicsville, Savage's Station, White Oak Swamp, Gaines's Mill, and Malvern Hill, (July 1, 1862,) the result of which was that the Union army was compelled to retreat and abandon the conquest of Richmond. He wrote to Secretary Stanton, June 28, "If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you or to any other persons in Washington. You have done your best to sacrifice this army." In July, 1862, he wrote the President a letter on the policy which ought, in his view, to be adopted in the conduct of the war. "Military power," he wrote, "should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude. . . . A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies."

In August his army left the peninsula, and was moved by water from the James River to Aqui'a Creek About the 2d of September he was appointed general-in-chief of the army which had been commanded by Pope and had been driven back to Washington. General Lee, having crossed the Potomac into Maryland, was pursued by McClellan, who gained a victory at Antietam Creek on the 16th and 17th of September, 1862. The Union army lost in this battle 11,426 in killed and wounded, and was unprepared or unable to pursue Lee, who retired to Virginia on the 18th of September. On the 6th of October McClellan was ordered to cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy or drive him south; but he delayed his advance for about three weeks, and was removed from command by an order dated the 5th of November and received on the 7th. In August, 1864, he was nominated as Democratic candidate for the Presidency by the Convention at Chicago. He received at the election only twenty-one electoral votes, cast by the States of Kentucky, Delaware, and New Jersey. He resigned his commission as major-general of the regular army, November 8, 1864, and made a long visit to Europe, from which he returned in 1868. He subsequently was appointed superintendent of docks and piers in the city of New York, a position which he resigned in 1872. In 1877 he was elected Governor of the State of New Jersey. Died October 29, 1885.

Mac-Cler'nand, (JOHN A.,) an American general, born in Breckinridge county, Kentucky, in 1812. He removed to Illinois, and served as a member of Congress from that State from 1843 to 1861. He commanded a brigade at Fort Donelson, February, 1862, and a division at Shiloh, April 6 and 7 of that year. He succeeded General Sherman as commander of an army in Mississippi in January, 1863, and directed a corps at the siege of Vicksburg in May. He was removed from this command before the end of that siege. Died in 1900.

Macclesfield, EARL OF. See PARKER.

Mac-Clint'ock, (Sir FRANCIS LEOPOLD,) a successful Arctic explorer, born at Dundalk, Ireland, in 1819. He entered the navy about 1831, and obtained the rank of lieutenant in 1845. In 1848 and 1849 he served under Sir James Ross in his expedition in search of Sir John Franklin. He distinguished himself by his enterprise, skill, and energy in several subsequent expeditions for the same purpose, and performed remarkable feats in sledge-travelling. In 1857 Captain McClintock received command of the "Fox" screw-steamer, fitted out by Lady Franklin for a final effort to obtain tidings of the lost navigator. In the winter of 1858–59 he and his officers performed extensive sledge-journeys, and in May found at Point Victory, on King William's Island, the record of Franklin's death and the remains of the last survivors of his party. (See FRANKLIN, Sir JOHN.) Soon after his return, September, 1859, he was knighted, and received various honours and rewards. He published a "Narrative of the Discovery of the Fate of Sir John Franklin," (1860.) He became vice-admiral in 1877.

Mac-Clint'ock, (JOHN,) D.D., an eminent American scholar and Methodist divine, born in Philadelphia in 1814, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1835. He was professor of Greek and Latin in Dickinson College at Carlisle, became editor of the "Methodist Quarterly Review" in 1848, and conducted the same with great ability for eight years. In 1857 he was appointed pastor of Saint Paul's Church, in the city of New York, where he acquired distinction as a pulpit orator. He accepted in 1860 the charge of the American Chapel in Paris. During the civil war he rendered important services to the cause of the Union by his pen and voice, and his home in Paris became a rallying centre for patriotic Americans. Having returned home about 1865, he resumed his literary labours, and was selected in 1867 to organize the Drew Theological Seminary. His most important work, in which he was assisted by Dr. W. Strong, is a "Theological and Biblical Cyclopædia," in 10 vols., of which only three volumes were published before his death, which occurred March 4, 1870.

Mac-Clos'key, (JOHN,) D.D., an American cardinal, born in Brooklyn, New York, March 20, 1810. He was trained in the college and seminary at Emmittsburg, Maryland, was ordained a priest in 1834, and studied two years at Rome. In 1844 he was consecrated Bishop of Axiere and made coadjutor of the Bishop of New York. In 1847 he was installed Bishop of Albany, where his administration was brilliantly successful. In 1864 he was promoted to be Archbishop of New York, and in 1875 was created a cardinal-priest. Died in 1885.

MacCloskey, (WILLIAM GEORGE,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Brooklyn, New York, November 10, 1823. He graduated at the college in Emmittsburg, Maryland, in 1847, and became a professor in Saint Mary's Theological Seminary, (Roman Catholic,) was in 1859 appointed president of the American College in Rome, and in 1868 was consecrated Bishop of Louisville, Kentucky.

Mac-Clure' or Maclure, (Sir ROBERT LE MESURIER,) a navigator, was born at Wexford, Ireland, in 1807. After serving many years in the navy, he accompanied Sir James Ross in search of Sir John Franklin in 1848. On his return, in 1849, he was raised to the rank of captain. In 1850, as captain of the Investigator, he was directed to renew the enterprise by advancing eastward from Behring's Strait. He entered a strait which he named the Prince of Wales Strait, and, after his ship was frozen fast, he pursued the exploration by sledges until he reached Melville or Barrow's Strait, in the winter of 1850–51. This is called the first discovery of the Northwest Passage. In the next season he discovered a second passage, on the north side of Baring Island. In 1853 he was extricated from a perilous situation by Captain Kellet, who arrived at Melville Island from the east; but he was forced to abandon the Investigator. On his return home he received a reward of £5000 for his discoveries. Died October 17, 1873.

Mac-clurg', (JAMES,) an American physician, born at Hampton, Virginia, in 1747, was the author of a treatise "On the Human Bile," which was translated into several languages. Died in 1825.

Mac-Cŏwn', (JOHN PORTER,) an officer, born in Tennessee, served in the Mexican war in 1847, and became a brigadier-general in the Confederate army in 1861.

Mac-Coy, (Sir FREDERICK K.,) a British geologist, born at Dublin in 1823. He became actively engaged on the geological survey of Ireland, studying the fossils, on which he published several illustrated works. He was one of the first professors in the Queen's University, Ireland, and for more than thirty years was professor of natural science in the University of Melbourne. He wrote largely on zoology and paleontology, was elected a F.R.S. in 1880, and received many other marks of honour.

Mac-Cra'ry, (GEORGE WASHINGTON,) an American cabinet officer, was born near Evansville, Indiana, in 1835. He was elected to the Wisconsin legislature in 1857, to the State senate in 1861, and was in Congress from 1868 to 1876, when he entered the Hayes cabinet as secretary of war. He was judge of the Eighth Judicial District 1879–84. Died June 23, 1890.

MacCrea, mąk-krā', (JANE,) a daughter of a Scottish clergyman in New Jersey, was murdered in 1777 by the Indian allies of Burgoyne, near Fort Edward, on the Hudson.

MacCrie, mąk-kree', (THOMAS,) an eloquent Scottish Presbyterian writer, born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, in 1772. He belonged to "the most straitest sect" of his religion, styled "Anti-Burghers," a part of the Secession Church. About 1795 he was ordained minister of a congregation in Edinburgh. In 1811 or 1812 he published a "Life of John Knox," which obtained great popularity. His "Life of Andrew Melville" (1819) displays, with warm sectarian partiality, much learning and ability. He afterwards produced, besides other works, an interesting "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy," (1827.) Died in 1835. In reference to his "Life of Knox," Lord Jeffrey says, "We do not hesitate to pronounce it by far the best piece of history which has appeared since the commencement of our critical career. It is extremely accurate, learned, and concise, and at the same time very full of spirit and animation."

MacCulloch, mąk-kul'lǫh, (HUGH,) an American banker and statesman, born at Kennebunk, Maine, in 1808. He studied in Bowdoin College, and in 1835 became a lawyer at Fort Wayne, Indiana. He was later a bank-president. From 1863 to 1865 he was United States comptroller of the currency. He was secretary of the treasury from 1865–69, and again in 1884–85. In 1870 he became a banker in London. He published "Men and Measures of Half a Century," (1888,) and became LL.D. of Bowdoin College in 1889. Died May 24, 1895.

MacCulloch, mąk-kul'lǫh, (JOHN,) F.R.S., a British geologist and naturalist, born in Guernsey in 1773. He studied medicine, which he practised for a short time. About 1812 he began to make a scientific survey and exploration of Scotland in the service of the government, and while thus employed he examined the geology and mineralogy of that region. He became well versed in many natural sciences and in several arts. In 1821 he published a "Geological Classification of Rocks," etc., and in 1824 "The Highlands and Western Isles of Scotland, in a Series of Letters to Sir W. Scott." For many years, ending in 1832, he was employed in the geological and mineralogical survey of Scotland. He afterwards published the results of this survey in an excellent mineralogical map. Died in 1835.

MacCulloch, (JOHN RAMSAY,) an eminent Scottish writer on political economy and commerce, was born in Wigtonshire about 1789. He edited the "Scotsman" in Edinburgh for a few years, and contributed many articles to the "Edinburgh Review." About 1828 he removed to London and became professor of political economy in the new university. He wrote many works, which are highly esteemed. Among these are "The Principles of Political Economy," (1825,) a valuable "Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navigation," (1832,) and a "Dictionary, Geographical, Statistical, and Historical," etc. About 1838 he became comptroller of the stationery office, London. Died in 1864.

Macdonald, [Fr. pron. măk'do'năl',] (ÉTIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH,) Duke of Tarentum, an able French marshal, was born of a Scottish family at Sancerre in 1765. For his conduct at Jemmapes (1792) he was made a colonel. In 1793, as general of brigade, he served under Pichegru in Flanders. He was made a general of division in 1795 or 1796, and joined the army of Italy in 1797. In February, 1799, he succeeded Championnet in the chief command at Rome, where his operations were successful. He commanded at the great battle of Trebbia, (June, 1799,) where the superior numbers of the allied forces under Suwarow were victorious. In November, 1800, he led an army to Italy by the celebrated passage of the Splugen, which, says Alison, "was perhaps the most wonderful achievement of modern war." ("History of Europe.") He was sent as ambassador to Denmark in 1802, and returned in 1804. After this he passed about five years without employment, having, it is supposed, offended Bonaparte by his public expressions in favour of Moreau. Having received command of a division in 1809, he displayed great skill and courage at Wagram, (July, 1809,) where Bonaparte gave him a marshal's bâton on the field of battle. Soon after this event he was created Duke of Tarentum. In the Russian campaign of 1812, Marshal Macdonald commanded the tenth corps. He contributed to the victories of Lutzen and Bautzen, (1813,) and served the emperor with fidelity to the last in the campaign of 1814. When Napoleon was about to abdicate, he expressed his grateful sense of Macdonald's services, and presented to him a Turkish sabre. Having declared his adhesion to Louis XVIII., he refused to serve his former master during the Hundred Days, and in 1816 was appointed grand chancellor of the legion of honour, and commander of a military division. He died in 1840, leaving his title of duke to an only son.

His fluent elocution, admirable temper, and refined manners procured his admission into the best society. He had a "boundless literary ambition," and a most capacious and accurate memory. In defence, or rather ardent eulogy, of the first reforms of the French Revolution, he produced, in answer to Burke's famous "Reflections," his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," (1791,) which raised him into sudden celebrity and caused him to be warmly caressed by Fox, Sheridan, and other chiefs of the Whig party. About this time he renounced medicine and became a student of law. He was called to the bar in 1795, gave special attention to public law, and practised with success in the home circuit. In 1799 he delivered a series of lectures "On the Law of Nature and of Nations," which were highly applauded by the most eminent judges of all parties as a noble monument of intellectual power and wisdom. He expressed in these lectures more conservative views than those of his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ." In 1803 he gained a high reputation for forensic eloquence by his defence of M. Peltier, a French emigrant, who was tried for a libel on Bonaparte, and was acquitted. This speech was translated into French by Madame de Staël. He accepted the office of recorder of Bombay, where he arrived in 1804, and was appointed judge of the admiralty court in 1806. Sir James returned to England in 1812, and was elected to Parliament by the Whigs in 1813. He won and maintained a high place among parliamentary speakers. From 1818 to 1824 he was professor of law and politics in the college at Haileybury. He contributed to the "Edinburgh Review," and wrote an important "Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy," which appeared among the preliminary essays of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." In 1830 he accepted office as commissioner for the affairs of India under the ministry of Earl Gray. He made a powerful and luminous speech in the House on the Reform bill in 1831. He wrote a "History of England," a work of great merit, which was published in "Lardner's Cyclopædia," (1831.) He died in May, 1832, leaving unfinished a "History of the Revolution in England in 1688," which was published in 1832. "We have no hesitation," says Macaulay, "in pronouncing this fragment decidedly the best history now extant of the reign of James II. . . . The intellectual and moral qualities which are most important in a historian, he possessed in a very high degree. He was singularly mild, calm, and impartial in his judgments of men and of parties." The same critic adds, "He distinguished himself highly in Parliament. But nevertheless Parliament was not exactly the sphere for him. The effect of his most successful speeches was small, when compared with the quantity of ability and learning which was expended on them."

Mac-klin', (CHARLES,) a popular Irish actor and dramatist, (whose family name was McLaughlin,) was born at Westmeath in 1690. He appeared on the London stage in 1725, and did not retire until 1789. He excelled in the rôle of "Shylock," and wrote, besides several other plays, a successful comedy called "The Man of the World." Died in 1797, at the age of 107.

In 1872 he took orders in the Episcopal Church, and in 1875 he was made Bishop of Illinois.

Mac-lau'rin, (COLIN,) an eminent Scottish mathematician, born at Kilmodan in 1698. He obtained the chair of mathematics in Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1717. In 1720 he published "Geometria Organica sive Descriptio Linearum Curvarum universalis," a treatise on curve lines, which is said to have excited the admiration of Newton. In 1725 he was appointed assistant of Professor Gregory in the University of Edinburgh, where he remained about twenty years. While he was employed in fortifying Edinburgh against the Pretender's army, in 1745, he contracted a disease which hastened his death. He shared with D. Bernoulli and Euler the prize awarded in 1740 by the Academy of Paris for a memoir on Tides. He was the author of several original and profound works, among which are a "Treatise on Fluxions," (1742,) and a "Treatise on Algebra," (1748.) Died in 1746.

MacLean or Maclean, mak-lān', (JOHN,) an American statesman and jurist, born in Morris county, New Jersey, in March, 1785. He removed with his father to Ohio about 1798, was admitted to the bar in 1807, and began to practise at Lebanon. In 1812 he was elected a member of Congress, in which he acted with the Democrats, and supported the war against England. He was again elected by a unanimous vote in 1814, was a judge of the supreme court of Ohio from 1816 to 1822, and became postmaster-general in 1823. He filled this office with great credit and ability until March, 1829, during which period he introduced many improvements and brought the department into a state of the highest efficiency. He declined a place in the cabinet of President Jackson, and was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the United States in 1829. He dissented from the decision of the court in the Dred Scott case, as given by Chief-Justice Taney in 1857, and opposed the extension of slavery. At the Republican National Convention of 1856 he received one hundred and ninety-six votes as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. Died in Cincinnati in April, 1861.

Maclise, măk-leess', (DANIEL,) a popular historical painter, born at Cork, Ireland, in 1806. He went to London in 1828, and became a student in the Royal Academy, where he quickly won several prize medals. He gained a high reputation by his "Vow of the Ladies and the Peacock," (1835,) and "Merry Christmas in the Baron's Hall," (1838.) In 1840 he was elected an Academician. Among his admired productions are "The Sleeping Beauty," (1841,) "The Play Scene in Hamlet," (1842,) "Noah's Sacrifice," (1847,) and "Shakspeare's Seven Ages," (1848.) He is regarded as one of the most original of English painters of the present time. Died in April, 1870.

MacIure. See MACCLURE.

Mac-Iure', (WILLIAM,) an eminent naturalist, and pioneer of American geology, born at Ayr, in Scotland, in 1763. Having made an extensive scientific tour in Europe, he removed to the United States, and about 1806 entered upon a geological survey of that country. In the accomplishment of this task, he visited nearly every State and Territory in the Union, and crossed and recrossed the Alleghanies fifty times. An account of his tour was published in the "Transactions of the American Philosophical Society," (1809.) In 1812 Mr. Maclure became one of the first members of the Academy of Natural Sciences just founded at Philadelphia, and was elected president of that institution in 1817. He continued to fill this post for twenty-two years, and the "Journal" of the Academy was begun under his auspices. His donations of books to the Academy amounted to nearly fifteen hundred volumes, comprising valuable works on natural history, antiquities, etc., and he gave the sum of $20,000 towards the erection of the building on Broad Street, finished in 1840. Died in 1840, at San Angel, in Mexico, whither he had gone on account of his health.

Macomb, ma-koom' or ma-kōm', (ALEXANDER,) a distinguished American general, born at Detroit in 1782. He served in the war of 1812, and, as brigadier-general, in 1814, gained the victory of Plattsburg over the British at the same time that Commodore Macdonough signally defeated them on the lake. General Macomb was appointed in 1835 commander-in-chief of the United States army. Died in 1841.

See the "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. i.

Macomb, (WILLIAM H.,) an American commodore, a son of General Alexander Macomb, was born in Michigan in 1820. He entered the navy in 1834, served with distinction through the war of 1861–65 with the rank of commander, and was made a commodore in 1870. Died at Philadelphia, August 12, 1872.

Mā'con, (NATHANIEL,) an American statesman, born in Warren county, North Carolina, in 1757. He served as a private in the army from 1778 to 1782, and opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, (1788.) In 1791 he was elected a member of Congress for a district of North Carolina, which he represented until 1815. He was always a Democrat, and a strict-constructionist. He was Speaker of the National House of Representatives for three terms, (1801–06,) and became a Senator of the United States in 1816. His speeches were short, but effective. He served in the Senate until 1826, having then been a member of Congress for thirty-seven consecutive years. He died in Warren county, North Carolina, in June, 1837. John Randolph called him "the best and wisest man that I ever knew."

Mac-Os'car, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish minor poet, born at Lochwinnoch, May 7, 1806. He was a schoolmaster, and lived many years in London. Died at Kilbarchan, January 11, 1877. His "Poetical Works" were published in 1878.

Mac-Pher'son, (EDWARD,) LL.D., an American author, was born at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 31, 1830. He graduated at Pennsylvania College in 1848, and became a journalist. He was in Congress from 1859 to 1863, and was clerk of the lower house of Congress, 1863–69. He published a "Political History of the United States," (1864,) a "Political Manual," and other works. Died December 14, 1895.

Mac-pher'son, (JAMES,) a Scottish poet, celebrated as the translator or author of "Ossian," was born in Inverness-shire in 1738. After leaving college he became a school-teacher at Ruthven, and in 1758 published "The Highlander," a poem, which was not successful. In 1760 he surprised the literary world by the publication of "Fragments of Ancient Poetry collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language." These were admired by the poet Gray and others, and a subscription was raised to aid Macpherson in exploring the Highlands for other similar treasures. The ostensible result of this search appeared in "Fingal, an Epic Poem," (1762,) and "Temora, an Epic Poem," (1763,) which purported to be the work of Ossian, a poet of the third century. These poems found many enthusiastic admirers throughout Europe. An animated controversy ensued about their authenticity, which was defended by Dr. Blair and other eminent critics. Dr. Johnson, on the other hand, confidently maintained that they were forgeries. Many others adopt the theory that he caught the spirit of the Ossianic poetry from the tales of the old Celtic bards, but supplied from his own invention much of the peculiar imagery and cloudy verbiage which abound in his pretended translations. About 1772 he settled in London, and produced a prose version of the "Iliad," which was a failure, a "History of Great Britain," and other works. He was a member of Parliament from 1780 to 1790. Died in 1796.

Mac-Pher'son, (JAMES BIRDSEYE,) an eminent American general, born in Sandusky county, Ohio, in November, 1828. He entered the Military Academy of West Point in 1849, and graduated at the head of his class in 1853. Having been assigned to the corps of engineers, he was employed as engineer at New York, Fort Delaware, and Alcatraz Island, California. He obtained the rank of first lieutenant in 1858, and that of captain in August, 1861. In November ensuing he became aide-de-camp to General Halleck, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He served as chief engineer on General Grant's staff at the capture of Fort Donelson, and at the battle of Shiloh, April 6 and 7, 1862. In May of that year he was appointed a colonel in the regular army, and brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded a division which broke through the lines of General Price, then investing Corinth, and marched in to the relief of the garrison in October. For this service he was promoted to the rank of major-general on the 8th of October, 1862. Having obtained command of the seventeenth army corps in December, he served under General Grant in the campaign against Vicksburg. His corps gained a victory at Raymond on the 12th of May, 1863, and, with the aid of General Sherman's corps, defeated General Joseph E. Johnston at Jackson on the 14th. General McPherson contributed to the victory of Champion's Hills, and took part in two unsuccessful assaults on the works of Vicksburg in May. For his services in this campaign he was promoted to be a brigadier-general in the regular army, to date from the capture of Vicksburg, and was appointed commander of the district of Vicksburg, July, 1863. He served under Sherman in the expedition to Meridian in February, 1864. In the next month, General Grant, who had just been nominated general-in-chief of all the Union armies, wrote a letter to Sherman, in which he expressed his thanks to Sherman and McPherson as the men to whom he was most indebted for his success. On the 12th of March, McPherson was appointed commander of the department and army of the Tennessee.

As commander of the army of the Tennessee, he maintained his high reputation in the campaign which Sherman conducted in Georgia. His army fought with success against the rebels at Dallas on the 28th of May. On the 27th of June, Generals Thomas and McPherson assaulted the fortified lines of Kenesaw Mountain, but were repulsed with severe loss. By a flank movement of the army of McPherson, General Johnston was induced to abandon his strong position at Kenesaw about July 3, and to retreat to Atlanta. After the Union armies had advanced to the vicinity of Atlanta, the enemy adopted a bolder policy, and made several attacks, in one of which McPherson was killed, July 22, 1864. "About 1 P.M. of this day," says General Grant, "the brave, accomplished, and noble-hearted McPherson was killed." (Report, dated July 22, 1865.)

Macquer, mȧ'kaĭr', (PHILIPPE,) a French littérateur and advocate, born in Paris in 1720. He was author of a "Chronological Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History," (2 vols., 1751,) "Roman Annals," (1756,) and an "Abridged History of Spain and Portugal," (2 vols., 1759,) (all in French,) which were received with favour. Died in 1770.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Macquer, (PIERRE JOSEPH,) a meritorious French chemist and physician, born in Paris in 1718, was a brother of the preceding. He discovered new properties in many chemical substances, and is said to have been the first who proved that the diamond is combustible, (1771.) He published "Elements of Theoretical Chemistry," (1741,) and a valuable "Dictionary of Chemistry," (1766.) In 1745 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He succeeded Bourdelin as professor of chemistry at the Jardin du Roi, and edited the scientific department of the "Journal des Savants" from 1768 to 1776. Died in 1784.

Mąc-quoid', (KATHARINE S.,) an English authoress, born in Kentish Town, London, about 1835. Among her works are many novels ("A Bad Beginning," (1862,) "Hester Kirton," "Patty," (1871,) "Doris Barugh," (1878,) "Beside the River," "Fifine," etc.,) and some books of travel, such as "Through Normandy," "Through Brittany," "In the Ardennes," etc. Some of her works have been illustrated by her husband, Mr. Thomas R. Macquoid.

Macready, mą-kree'de, (WILLIAM CHARLES,) a popular English tragic actor, born in London in 1793. He made a successful début at Birmingham in 1810, and appeared on the London stage in 1816, when he performed "Orestes" at Covent Garden with great applause. His reputation was increased by his performance of the "Virginius" of Sheridan Knowles, and of "Richard III." and other leading characters of Shakspeare. From 1837 to 1839 he was lessee and manager of Covent Garden Theatre. About 1842 he assumed the management of Drury Lane; but, as he failed to make it profitable, he kept it only two or three seasons. He performed with great success in the principal cities of the United States in 1848 and 1849. While he was in this country, a quarrel between him and Edwin Forrest resulted in a serious riot in New York. He retired from the stage in 1851. Died April 27, 1873.

Macret, mȧ'krȧ', (CHARLES FRANÇOIS ADRIEN,) a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1750; died in 1783.

Mac-rĭ-ā'nus, [Fr. MACRIEN, mȧ'kre-ȧN',] (MARCUS FULVIUS,) a Roman emperor, born in Egypt. He rose from the lowest to the highest rank in the army. The emperor Valerian having been taken prisoner by the Persians, a part of the army, in 261 A.D., chose for his successor Macrianus, who was then an old man. In 262 he was defeated in Illyricum, and put to death, by Domitian, a general of Gallienus.

Madier de Montjau, mā'de-ā' deh mòn'zhō', (PAULIN,) a French advocate and judge, born at Bourg-Saint-Andéol in 1785. He showed firmness and sagacity in the repression of the excesses committed by the royalists about 1816–20. Died May 10, 1865.

Mad'i-son, (JAMES,) D.D., an American prelate, born in Rockingham county, Virginia, in 1749, became Episcopal Bishop of Virginia in 1790. He had been previously elected president of William and Mary College. Died in 1812.

Madison, (JAMES,) an eminent American statesman, the fourth President of the United States, born in King George county, Virginia, on the 16th of March, 1751, was a son of Colonel James Madison and Eleanor or Nelly Conway. He entered Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1769, and graduated in 1771, after which he studied law. In 1776 he was elected a member of the Assembly or Convention of Virginia. He was defeated in the election of 1777 because he refused to "treat" the voters; but he was elected a member of the General Congress by the Assembly of Virginia in 1779. From this period he was one of the most prominent men in the political history of the republic. He was re-elected in 1786, and was a member of the National Convention which met at Philadelphia in 1787 to form the Constitution of the United States. He took a prominent part in the debates on the Constitution, and advocated the adoption of the same by a series of able essays, forming part of "The Federalist," which is the joint production of Hamilton, Madison, and Jay. Madison was a member of the Virginia Convention which, after a spirited contest, adopted the Federal Constitution by a small majority in June, 1788. He became a member of Congress in 1789, and united with the Republicans as a moderate opponent of the administration of Washington and the financial measures of Hamilton. He was disposed to be a mediator rather than a partisan in the dissensions which arose among the founders of the republic. In 1794 he married Dorothy Todd, originally Dorothy Paine, a woman eminent for her virtues and accomplishments. He declined the office of secretary of state vacated by Jefferson in December, 1793, and continued to serve in Congress until 1797. He opposed the alien and sedition laws of 1798, and was the author of a series of resolutions adopted by the Assembly of Virginia and known as the Resolutions of 1798, which protested against all attempts to increase the power of the Federal government by forced constructions of general clauses of the Constitution. He was appointed secretary of state by President Jefferson in March, 1801, and filled that office for eight years in such a manner as to acquire the confidence and approbation of the people. Having been nominated for the Presidency by a caucus of Republican members of Congress, he was elected n 1808, receiving one hundred and twenty-two electoral votes out of one hundred and seventy-five, which was the whole number. Charles C. Pinckney, the Federal candidate, received forty-seven votes. On entering upon the office of President, March 4, 1809, he found the United States involved in difficulties and disputes with the British government, which had offended the Americans by impressing seamen and by searching American vessels for deserters, and had injured their commerce by orders in council. His cabinet at first consisted of Robert Smith, secretary of state, Albert Gallatin, secretary of the treasury, William Eustis, secretary of war, and Paul Hamilton, secretary of the navy.

In May, 1810, Congress passed a non-intercourse act. The President sent to Congress a special message on the subject of British aggressions about the 1st of June, 1812, and war was declared on the 18th of the same month. A few days later the British ministry repealed their orders in council in relation to the rights of neutrals, but they refused to satisfy the Americans in relation to the impressment of seamen. In the autumn of 1812 Mr. Madison was re-elected to the Presidency by one hundred and twenty-eight electoral votes. His competitor was De Witt Clinton, who received eighty-nine votes. The slave States, with Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Vermont, voted for Madison. A strong party in the United States was opposed to the war of 1812, which was waged with various success on land and sea. Commodore Perry gained a naval victory on Lake Erie in September, 1813. About the 3d of July, 1814, a small American army invaded Canada, gained a victory at Chippewa, and fought a severe battle at Lundy's Lane, or Niagara, (July 25,) in which the Americans lost 743 killed and wounded and the British lost 878. In August of that year a small British force ascended the Chesapeake, took Washington by a sudden movement, and burned the Capitol. A treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, December 24, 1814; but, before the tidings of this event had reached the United States, General Jackson gained a signal victory over the British at New Orleans, January 8, 1815. In 1816 Madison approved a bill which Congress had passed to charter the Bank of the United States for twenty years. On the 4th of March, 1817, he retired from public life. He passed the remainder of his days on his farm at Montpelier, Orange county, Virginia. He was a member of the Virginia Convention called in 1829 to revise the Constitution of the State. Died at Montpelier, June 28, 1836.

"This great statesman and philosopher," says R. W. Griswold, "was the confidential, personal, and political friend of Jefferson; but in almost every respect their characters were essentially different. Mr. Madison's intellect was of a far higher order, and its ascendency over his passions was nearly perfect. His triumphs were those of pure reason. His public and private life were above reproach. . . . His writings on the Constitution and other subjects were second only to those of Hamilton in ability and influence; and his extensive information, sound judgment, skill as a logician, and unvarying courtesy, secured him the highest consideration in the Congresses of which he was a member." ("Prose Writers of America.") He left in manuscript "Reports of the Debates in the National Convention of 1788," which were purchased by Congress after his death, and published in 3 vols., (1840.) This is a work of great value to students of political philosophy.

Mad'oc or Madog, the second son of Owen Gwynedd, Prince of Wales, lived in the twelfth century. Some writers favour the hypothesis that he discovered America about 1170, at which period he was compelled to leave Wales by a successful rebellion against his dynasty. Tradition informs us that he sailed from Wales on a second expedition to the newly-discovered shores, and was never heard from after. His history furnishes the subject of Southey's poem entitled "Madoc."

Mad'ox, (Thomas,) an eminent English antiquary, was an inmate of the Middle Temple, London, and was called to the bar about 1704. He was a diligent collector of old legal and historical records, and obtained the title of royal historiographer. His principal work is "The History and Antiquities of the Exchequer of the Kings of England from the Norman Conquest to the End of the Reign of Edward II.," (1711.) He also published "Firma Burgi; or, A Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England," (1726.) Died about 1735.

See Nichols and Bowyer, "Literary Anecdotes."

Madoz, mȧ-dōth', (Pascual,) a Spanish author and liberal statesman, was born at Pampeluna in 1806. He chose the profession of the law, and was appointed a judge at Barcelona in 1835. He edited a "Universal Geographical Dictionary," (1831–34,)—a work of decided merit. Having been elected a deputy to the Cortes, he removed to Madrid, where he devoted much time to an arduous and successful enterprise, as editor of a voluminous "Geographical-Historical Dictionary of Spain," (1848,) which is, perhaps, the most complete and excellent work of the kind ever published. Madoz became a leader of the party called Progresistas, and was minister of finance for about four months in 1855. Died December 11, 1870.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Madrazo, de, dȧ mȧ-drȧ'tho, (Don Federico,) a Spanish painter, a son of the following, was born at Rome in 1815. He painted portraits with success, and became court painter at Madrid. He gained a medal of the first class in 1855. Died June 10, 1894.

Madrazo y Agudo, de, dȧ mȧ-drȧ'tho e ȧ-goo'do, (Don José,) a Spanish painter of history and portraits, born at Santander in 1781. He became court painter to Ferdinand VII., and director of the Academy of Madrid. Died in 1859.

Madrid, de, dȧ mȧd-rĕd', (José Fernandez,) born at Carthagena, South America, in 1789. He was chosen president of the republic of New Granada in 1816, but in the same year was made prisoner by the Spaniards. After an imprisonment of nine years in Havana, he escaped in 1825, after which he was employed by Bolivar as secret agent in Paris. He wrote "Atala," a tragedy. Died in 1830.

Madrolle, mȧ'drol', (Antoine,) a French writer on religion and politics, born at Saint-Seine in 1792. He published numerous works, in which he advocated ultramontane doctrines. Died in 1861.

Madvig, mȧd'vig, (Johann or Jens Nikolai,) a Danish philologist, born in the isle of Bornholm in 1804. He was appointed minister of public instruction in 1848. Among his works are "Opuscula Academica," 2 vols., (1834–42,) a noted "Latin Grammar," (1841,) and editions of Latin authors. Died in 1886.

Mæcenas, mē-see'nas, [It. Mecenate, mȧ-chȧ-nȧ'tȧ, or Mecenato; Fr. Mécène, mȧ'sȧn',] (Caius Cilnius,) a celebrated patron of literature at Rome, was born probably about 70 B.C. He was descended from an ancient and royal Etruscan family, and belonged to the equestrian order. (Horace, Carm. I. 1–20.) He was the friend of Octavius before his accession as the emperor Augustus. His fidelity and talents having been approved in many important negotiations, Octavius intrusted to him the administration of Rome during his absence in 36 B.C. when he went to war against Sextus Pompeius. After the battle of Actium (31 A.D.) had rendered Octavius master of Rome, he is said to have followed the counsel of Mæcenas in founding an empire instead of restoring the republic. Agrippa and Mæcenas were the favourites and chief ministers of Augustus for many years. The political career of the latter ended about 16 B.C. Mæcenas was versed in Greek and Roman literature, and rendered his name memorable by his liberal patronage of Horace, Virgil, and other poets, who were his intimate friends. His name had become proverbial as a patron of letters as early as the time of Martial. It is said that Virgil's "Georgics" was written at the request of Mæcenas. In the councils of state he advocated mild and liberal measures and the free expression of opinions. He wrote several mediocre works, of which only small fragments are extant. Died in 8 B.C.

Mae'terlinck, (MAURICE,) a Belgian dramatist, born at Ghent in 1864. He has been called the "Belgian Shakspeare," and became well known by "La Princesse Maleine," (1890,) which was followed by various other plays, essays, etc.

Mævius, mee've-us, an obscure Roman poetaster of the Augustan age, acquired notoriety by his envious attacks on the best poets of his time. His name has been saved from oblivion by the ridicule of Virgil, who mentions him in his Third Eclogue. The name of Gifford's satiric poem "The Mæviad" is derived from Mævius.

Maffei, mäf-fā'ee, (ANDREA,) an Italian poet, born at Riva di Trento in 1802. He published several volumes of original verse, but is chiefly known for his excellent translations from other literatures, mainly English and German. Died in 1885.

Maffei, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Vicenza. He imitated Paul Veronese in colouring. His style is grand, but rather exaggerated. Died about 1660.

Maffei, (FRANCESCO SCIPIONE,) MARQUIS, a celebrated Italian scholar and author, born at Verona in June, 1675. He made a campaign in the service of Bavaria, and distinguished himself at Donauwerth in 1704, but soon renounced the military profession and devoted himself to literature. In 1713 he produced "Merope," a tragedy, which was highly applauded, and ran through seventy editions in forty years. His principal work, "Verona Illustrata," (2 vols. fol., 1731,) treats of the origin, history, and literary history of Verona. It is admirable for profound research, sound criticism, and elegant style. He also wrote "Introduction to the Science of Diplomatics," ("Istoria diplomatica che serve d'Introduzione all' Arte critica in tal Materia,") and other works. He was a member of the Royal Societies of London and of Berlin. Died in 1755.

Maffei, [Lat. MAFFÆ'IUS or MAPHÆ'US,] (GIOVANNI PIETRO,) an excellent Italian writer, born at Bérgamo in 1535. He went to Rome and entered the order of Jesuits in 1565, after which he lectured on eloquence for six years at the Roman College with great success. His most celebrated work is "Historiæ Indicæ," ("History of India," 1588,) of which the style is the chief merit. "Maffei," says Hallam, "threw all the graces of a pure Latin style over his description of the East." He wrote a "Life of Loyola," (1585,) and other works. Died in 1603.

Maf'fitt, (JOHN NEWLAND,) a noted Methodist preacher, born at Dublin, Ireland, in 1794. Having emigrated to the United States in 1819, he became in 1833 associate editor of the "Western Methodist," published at Nashville, Tennessee. He was elected professor of elocution at La Grange College, Alabama, in 1837. Died in 1850.

Mafoma. See MOHAMMED.

Magalhaens. See MAGELLAN.

Magalhaens, mä-gäl-yä'ĕns, (GABRIEL,) a Portuguese missionary, born near Coimbra in 1609, laboured in the Jesuit missions in China from 1640 until his death, in 1677, and wrote a "Description of China," (1688.)

Magalhaens de Gandavo, de, dā mä-gäl-yä'ĕns dā gän-dä'vo, (PEDRO,) a Portuguese historian, born at Braga about 1550. He passed some years in Brazil, and published at Lisbon in 1576 a "History of Brazil," a work of some merit.

Magalon, mä'gä'lôn', (JEAN DENIS,) a French writer and journalist, born at Bagnoles in 1794; died about 1840.

Magalotti, mä-gä-lot'tee, (LORENZO,) COUNT, an Italian philosopher, born at Rome in 1637, was versed in ancient and modern languages. He became a resident of Florence, the grand duke of which employed him on diplomatic missions to Vienna and Mantua. Among his works are a treatise against atheism, called "Familiar Letters," (1719,) "Scientific and Learned Letters," ("Lettere scientifiche ed erudite," 1721,) and "Anacreontic Songs," (1723.) "The Letters of Magalotti and of Redi," says Hallam, "seem to do more credit than anything else to this period," (of Italian literature.) Died in 1712.

Maganza, mȧ-gȧn'zȧ, (ALESSANDRO,) an Italian historical painter, born at Vicenza in 1556. He imitated Paul Veronese with moderate success. Died in 1630. Alessandro had three sons, who were promising artists; but they died prematurely before their father.

See A. M. MENEGHELLI, "Elogio di A. Maganza," 1845; LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Maganza, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian painter, surnamed IL MAGAGNO, (ēl mȧ-gȧn'yo,) born at Vicenza in 1509, was the father of the preceding. He was a pupil of Titian, and was successful in portraits and history. He was author of a volume of poems, ("Rime,") published in 1570. Died in 1589.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie."

Maganza, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) a painter of the Venetian school, born at Vicenza in 1577, was a son and pupil of Alessandro, noticed above. Died in 1617.

Mā'gas, [Gr. Μάγας,] a king of Cyrene, and a stepson of Ptolemy Soter. Died in 258 B.C.

Magati, mȧ-gā'tee, or Magatti, mȧ-gȧt'tee, [Lat. MAGA'TUS,] (CESARE,) an eminent Italian surgical writer, born at Scandiano in 1579. He wrote "De rara Medicatione Vulnerum," (1616.) Died in 1647.

Magatus. See MAGATI.

Mag'dȧ-lene or Mag'dȧ-len, [Fr. MADELEINE or MADELÈNE, mȧd'lȧn',] (MARY,) an eminent Christian saint, was probably born at Magdala, in Galilee. She was one of the personal followers of Christ, by whom she was "healed of evil spirits and infirmities." (See Luke viii. 2.) Nothing appears to be known of her history in addition to the facts narrated by the four Evangelists. (See Matthew xxvii. and xxviii., Mark xvi., and John xix. 25 and xx. 1–18.) The learned differ on the question of her identity with Mary the sister of Lazarus of Bethany. The prevalent notion that her morals were very depraved before her conversion appears to have no real foundation.

Mą-gee', (WILLIAM,) Archbishop of Dublin, was born in Ireland in 1765. He opposed Unitarianism in "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement," (2 vols., 1801,) which procured for him a wide reputation. He became Bishop of Raphoe in 1819, and Archbishop of Dublin in 1822. Died in 1831.

Magee, (WILLIAM CONNOR,) D.D., a prelate, a grandson of the preceding, was born at Cork, December 17, 1821. He was educated at Kilkenny College, and at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1864 he was made Dean of Cork, and soon after dean of the Chapel Royal, Dublin. In 1868 he was consecrated Bishop of Peterborough, (Anglican,) and in 1891 became Archbishop of York. Died May 5, 1891.

Magellan, mȧ-jel'lȧn, [Sp. pron. mȧ-hēl-yȧn'; Port. MAGALHAENS, mȧ-gȧl-yā'ĕns,] (FERNANDO,) a Portuguese navigator, distinguished for his skill, enterprise, and important discoveries, was born about 1470. He served several years in the East Indies under Albuquerque, and took part in the capture of Malacca in 1511. A few years later he offered his services to Charles V., and received command of a fleet of five vessels and 230 men. With these he sailed, September, 1519, with a view to find a western route to the East Indies. He passed the winter of 1520 (from May to September) in the Bay of Saint Julian, about 49° south latitude, where a serious mutiny or conspiracy was suppressed by the execution of two captains of vessels. In October, 1520, he discovered and passed through the strait which bears his name. Pursuing his course through the great ocean of which he was the first navigator, and which he named the Pacific, he discovered the Ladrones about the 6th of March, 1521. He proceeded thence to the Philippine Isles, and was amicably received by the Prince of Zebu or Cebu. Having become an ally of this prince in a war against another small island of the same group, Magellan was killed in battle in April, 1521. One of his ships, the Vittoria, commanded by Sebastian del Cano, returned to Spain, and was the first that circumnavigated the globe. An Italian named Pigafetta accompanied Magellan in this last voyage, and kept a journal, which was published. (See PIGAFETTA.)

Magellan or Magalhaens, (JOÃO JACINTO,) was born at Lisbon in 1723. He emigrated to England about 1764, cultivated natural philosophy with success, and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society, (1774.) He wrote a "Description of English Octants and Sextants," and other scientific treatises. Died near London in 1790.

Magendie, mȧ'zhŏn'de', (FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French physiologist and physician, was born at Bordeaux on the 15th of October, 1783, and was educated in Paris. He became demonstrator of anatomy in the Faculty of Medicine, Paris, about 1805. In 1816 he produced a manual of physiology, "Précis élémentaire de Physiologie," which was translated into German and English. He was admitted into the Academy of Sciences about 1821, and became professor of anatomy or medicine in the College of France in 1831. His experiments contributed greatly to the progress of physiology. Among his important services was the discovery or demonstration of the functions of the spinal nerves. The honour of this discovery, however, is shared by Charles Bell. Magendie discovered that in the circulation of the blood, the arteries act not by irritability, but by elasticity, and proved that the veins are organs of absorption. He experimented on living animals more than any of his predecessors. Among his principal works are "Lectures on the Physical Phenomena of Life," ("Leçons sur les Phénomènes physiques de la Vie," 4 vols., 1836–42,) and "Lectures on the Functions and Diseases of the Nervous System," (2 vols., 1839.) He founded in 1821 the "Journal of Experimental Physiology," which he continued to edit until 1831. He was appointed president of the board of public health (comité consultatif d'hygiène publique) in 1848. Died in October, 1855.

Mageoghegan, (JAMES.) See MACGEOHEGAN.

Maggi, mȧd'jee, [Lat. MAD'IUS,] (CARLO MARIA,) an Italian poet, born at Milan in 1630. He became a member of the Academy Della Crusca, and professor of Greek in Milan. His works consist of Greek, Latin, and Italian poems, of Letters, etc. "Maggi bore an honourable part," says Hallam, "in the restoration of poetry." Died in 1699.

See L. A. MURATORI, "Vita di C. M. Maggi, Milanese," 1700, TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Maggi, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian painter and etcher, born in Rome about 1566; died after 1618.

Maggi, (GIROLAMO,) a lawyer and writer, born at Anghiari, in Tuscany. About 1560 he settled in Venice, where he published several works, among which were "The War of Flanders," a poem, and "Variæ Lectiones." Having been made prisoner by the Turks in Cyprus, he attempted to escape, was recaptured, and strangled in Constantinople in 1572.

Maggi, (LUCILIO FILALTEO,) a learned Italian physician, was born at Brescia about 1510. He obtained the chair of medicine in the University of Pavia about 1553. He wrote "Familiar Letters" ("Epistolæ Familiares") on the literary history of Italy. Died about 1570.

Maggio, mȧd'jo, or Magio, mȧ'jo, (FRANCESCO MARIA,) a monk, born at Palermo in 1612, became skilled in Oriental languages. He was employed as a missionary in Syria, Georgia, etc., and wrote a "Grammar of the Georgian Language." Died in 1686.

Mā'ġi, a religious sect or priestly caste of ancient Persia, which had exclusive possession of scientific knowledge. They worshipped fire and the sun, and were reformed by Zoroaster. In the Gospel certain members of this caste are mentioned as "wise men of the East." (See Matthew ii. 1.) In process of time the term Magi became synonymous with philosophers, learned men, astronomers, and soothsayers, or dealers in magic arts.

Mą-gill', (EDWARD H.,) LL.D., an American educator and scholar, was born in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, September 24, 1825. He graduated at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, in 1852. The same year he became principal of the classical department of the Providence High School, which position he held till 1859, when he was appointed sub-master of the Boston Latin School. Having in 1867 resigned his place in the Latin School, he spent some time in foreign travel. From 1871 to 1890 he was president of Swarthmore College, and subsequently professor of French there. The high degree of prosperity which that institution enjoys is due in no small measure both to his rare skill as an instructor and to his wise and efficient government. Dr. Magill is a zealous advocate of the co-education of the sexes, and the complete and signal success of this system at Swarthmore furnishes a practical argument in its favour not easy to refute or resist. During his connection with the Boston Latin School, Mr. Magill published a French Grammar and a series of French Readers which have been widely used in the schools and colleges of our country.

Magini, mâ-jee′nee, (GIOVANNI ANTONIO,) an Italian astronomer, born at Padua in 1555. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna from 1588 to 1617, and wrote many works, among which are "Ephemerides," and "New Theories of the Celestial Orbs," ("Novæ Cœlestium Orbium Theoriæ," 1589.) Died in 1617.

Ma-ginn′, (WILLIAM,) a witty and versatile writer, born at Cork, in Ireland, about 1793. He removed to London about 1824, and adopted literature as a profession. About this time he was a frequent contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," in which he appears as the "Morgan O'Doherty" of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." About 1828 he became sub-editor of "The Standard," a Tory paper, and began to write able and caustic articles for "Fraser's Magazine." He also wrote a novel called "Whitehall." Died in 1842.

See "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iii. chap. vii.; "Fraser's Magazine" for January, 1831, (with a portrait,) and for February, March, and April, 1838.

Magirus, mâ-gee′rŭs, (TOBIAS,) a German philosopher, born at Angermünde in 1586, taught logic and physics at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Died in 1651.

Magistris, de, (SIMONE,) an Italian priest, noted for his mastery of ancient languages, was born in Corsica in 1728; died at Rome in 1802.

Magliabecchi, mâl-yâ-bek′kee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian bibliomaniac and librarian, noted for his prodigious memory and learning, was born at Florence in 1633. He devoured a great number of books with avidity, became versed in languages and antiquities, and was regarded as an oracle by the learned. His habits were very eccentric. He was for many years librarian of Cosimo III., Grand Duke of Tuscany, and of his successors. At his death, in 1714, he left his rich library to the city of Florence, by which it is kept open to the public.

Magnan, mân′yôN′, (BERNARD PIERRE,) a French general, born in Paris in 1791. He served as captain at Waterloo, (1815,) and obtained the rank of colonel about 1827, after which he was employed in Algeria. He became a lieutenant-general in 1845, and commanded the army of the Alps in 1849. In July, 1851, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Paris, and in December, 1852, he was raised to the rank of marshal of France. Died in 1865.

See J. LASSAGNE, "Notice sur le Général Magnan," 1852.

Magnan, (DOMINIQUE,) a French antiquary and monk, born at Raillane in 1731. He lived in Avignon and Rome, and acquired a European reputation by his works, among which are a "Description of the City of Rome," (1763,) and several treatises on numismatics. Died in 1796.

Magnani, mân-yâ′nee, (CRISTOFORO,) an able Italian painter, born at Pizzighettone before 1550, was a pupil of Bernardino Campi.

Magnasco, mân-yâs′ko, (ALESSANDRO,) called LISSANDRINO, an Italian painter, born at Genoa in 1681. His favourite subjects were processions, etc. Died in 1747.

Magnasco, (STEFANO,) a painter, born about 1630, was the father of the preceding. Died in 1665.

Magne, mâñ, (PIERRE,) a French advocate and minister of state, born at Périgueux in 1806. He was appointed minister of public works in January, 1851, and minister of finance in February, 1855. He retired from this office about 1861. Died in 1879.

Magni, mâg′nee, or Magnus, mâg′nŭs, (JOHAN OI JONAS,) a Swedish bishop, born at Wexiö in 1583, wrote "Synopsis Historiæ universalis," (1622,) and other works. Died in 1651.

Magni, mân′yee, [Lat. MAG′NUS,] (VALERIANO,) an Italian writer and Capuchin friar, born at Milan about 1586. He wrote against the Jesuits. "This père," says Pascal, in a letter to the Jesuits, "has found the secret of stopping your mouth." Among his works is "Organum theologicum," (1643.) Died in 1661.

See PASCAL, "Lettres Provinciales."

Magnier, (EDMOND,) a French journalist and statesman, born at Boulogne-sur-Mer in 1841. In 1872 he founded the journal "Événement," which proved very successful. He became a deputy in 1876, a senator in 1891, and in 1895 was tried and convicted of complicity in railway frauds. His "History of a French Commune" and "Dante and the Middle Ages" are works of much value.

Magnier, mân′ye-a′, (LAURENT,) called also MANIÈRE, a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1618; died in 1700.

Magnin, mân′yăN′, (CHARLES,) a French critic, born in Paris in 1793. He acquired reputation as a critic of dramatic literature. Among his works are a series of "Lectures on the Drama," (1838,) and "Causeries et Méditations historiques et littéraires," (2 vols., 1842.) Died in 1862.

Magnocavalli, mân-yo-kâ-vâl′lee, (FRANCESCO OTTAVIO,) Count de Varengo, an Italian poet, born at Casal in 1707, wrote "Corradin, Marquis de Montferrat," and other tragedies. Died in 1788.

Magnol, mân′yol′, (PIERRE,) a French botanist and physician, born at Montpellier in 1638. He became professor of botany in his native city in 1694, before which he had published "Introduction to the General History of Plants," ("Prodromus Historiæ generalis Plantarum," 1689.) He had some sound ideas on botanical philosophy, and shares with other botanists of his time the merit of favouring the progress of the natural method. He wrote several minor works on botany. The genus Magnolia was named in his honour. Died in 1715.

See "Biographie Médicale."

Magnon, mân′yôN′, (JEAN,) a mediocre French poet and dramatist, born at Tournus. He left unfinished a poem entitled "La Science universelle," (1663.) He was assassinated at Paris in 1662.

Mag′nus I., King of Norway, surnamed THE GOOD, was the son of Saint Olaüs. He became king in 1034, and at the death of Canute II., in 1042, obtained the throne of Denmark. He died in 1047, leaving Norway to Harold, and Denmark to Sweyn, a nephew of Canute the Great.

See TORFÆUS, "Historia Rerum Norvegicarum."

Magnus, surnamed LADULOS, King of Sweden, born

In 1240, was the second son of Birger. He deposed his own brother, Waldemar, and reigned many years. He died in 1298, and was succeeded by his son, Birger.

Magnus, surnamed SMEK, King of Sweden, born in 1316, was the son of Duke Eric, and succeeded Birger in 1320. His actual reign began in 1337. He was placed under interdict by the pope, and deposed by his nobles about 1363, when Albert of Mecklenburg became king. Magnus died in 1374.

Mag'nus, a Greek physician, lived about 100 A.D. He was one of the Pneumatic sect.

Magnus, (ALBERTUS.) See ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

Magnus, mâg'nûs, (EDUARD,) a German painter of genre and portraits, born at Berlin in 1799. His works are commended as excellent in colour and correct in design. Died August 9, 1872.

Magnus, (HEINRICH GUSTAV,) a German physicist, born at Berlin, May 2, 1802. In 1834 he was made extraordinary professor of physics there, and in 1845 full professor. His main reputation came from his experiments and papers respecting heat, on the physics of gases, and on capillarity. He also made some chemical discoveries. Died April 4, 1870.

Magnus, mâg'nûs, or Magni, mâg'nee, (JOHAN or JONAS,) Archbishop of Upsal, was born at Linköping in 1488. He opposed the Reformation in Sweden without success, and retired to Rome, where he died in 1544. He was author of a "History of Sweden," in Latin, ("Historia Gothorum Suevorumque," 1554.)

Magnus, (OLAUS or OLOF,) a Swedish prelate, brother of the preceding, was born at Linköping about 1490. He was sent by Pope Paul III. to the Council of Trent in 1546. Magny, de, deh mȧn'yè', (OLIVIER,) a French poet, born at Cahors about 1524. He was a lover of Louise Labé, and a follower of the Pléiade. His "Odes," "Amours," "Soupirs," "Gayetés," etc., evince much talent. Died in 1560.

Mā'go, [Gr. Μάγων; Fr. MAGON, mȧ'gôn',] a Carthaginian admiral, who gained a victory over the fleet of Syracuse about 396 B.C. A few years later he was defeated by Dionysius in Sicily. He returned to Carthage, and was elected chief magistrate. Having led another land-army into Sicily, he was killed, and his army was defeated at Cabala by Dionysius, about 382 B.C. His son, MAGO, succeeded to the command of the army, and prosecuted the war with success.

Mago, a Carthaginian writer of uncertain period, was called "the father of agriculture" by Columella. He wrote an extensive work on agriculture, which was translated into Latin by the order of the Roman senate after the destruction of Carthage.

Mago, a brother of the famous Hannibal, followed him in the invasion of Italy, and held a high command at the battle of Cannæ, 216 B.C. He carried the news of this victory to Carthage, and solicited reinforcements, but was ordered to Spain, where he and Hasdrubal commanded for several years against the Scipios with various success. After gaining some advantages in Liguria, where he was severely wounded, he was ordered to hasten to the defence of Carthage, but he died during the voyage, in 203 B.C.

Magon. See MAGO.

Magon de Clos-Doré, mȧ'gôn' deh klo'do'rā', (CHARLES RENÉ,) a French rear-admiral, born in Paris in 1763. He was killed at the battle of Trafalgar, in 1805.

MAHA, mą-hȧ', [from the adjective mȧhȧt, "great,"] a Sanscrit prefix forming a portion of many Indian names, as MAHÂDEVA, "great god," MAHÂ-PRALYA, the "great destruction," etc. See these names in their alphabetical place.

Mahâ-Bali. See BALI.

Mȧhȧbhȧrătă, mą-hȧ'bȧ'rą-tą, or Mȧhȧbhȧrăt, mą-hȧ'bȧ'rąt, [from the Sanscrit mȧhȧ, "great," and Bhȧrătă, a descendant of Bhărătă, a famous Hindoo prince,] the name of the great epic poem of the Hindoos, so called because it treats of the war waged among the descendants of Bharata. It is said to contain 200,000 lines, or 100,000 double verses. Tradition ascribes it to Vyâsa, the arranger or editor of the Vedas. (See VYÂSA.) But there is reason to believe that it is the production or compilation of several—perhaps of many—writers, living in different ages, both before and after the Christian era. It was made a kind of cyclopædia of such knowledge as was deemed desirable for the Kshatriyas, or warrior caste.

Mȧhȧdêvă, mą-hȧ'dā'vą, or Mahâ-Deo, mą-hȧ' dā'o, (i.e. the "great god,") the name by which Siva is commonly known in many parts of India. (See SIVA.)

Mahan, (ALFRED T.,) an American naval captain and author, was born at West Point, New York, in 1840. He graduated at the Naval Academy in 1859, served through the civil war and until 1896, when he retired with the rank of captain. He was a member of the Naval Advisory Board in 1898 during the war with Spain. He became widely known as an author through his notable work, "The Influence of Sea-Power upon History," (1892–96,) and wrote lives of Farragut and Nelson, and other works.

Mą-han', (ASA,) D.D., an American divine, born at Vernon, New York, in 1799. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1824, and at Andover Seminary in 1827. In 1829 he was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, and he held various pastorates in that and the Congregationalist denomination. He was chosen president of Oberlin College in 1835, and of Cleveland University in 1850. He was also (1861–71) president of Adrian College. Among his works are "Science of Intellectual Philosophy," (1845,) "Doctrine of the Will," (1846,) "The True Believer," (1847,) "Science of Moral Philosophy," (1856,) "Science of Logic," (1857,) and a work entitled "Doctrine of Christian Perfection,"—a doctrine which he earnestly maintained. Died April 4, 1889.

Mahan, (Dennis Hart,) LL.D., an American soldier and engineer, born in New York, April 2, 1802. He graduated at West Point with highest honours in 1824, and was an assistant professor there, 1824–26, and professor of engineering, 1832–71. Among his works are treatises on "Field Fortifications," (1836,) "Civil Engineering," (1837; mostly rewritten, 1868,) "On Industrial Drawing," (1853,) "Descriptive Geometry," (1864,) and "Military Engineering," (part i., 1865; part ii., 1867.) He committed suicide by drowning, near Stony Point, New York, September 16, 1871.

He studied at Saint Paul's College, Flushing, New York, and in 1845 entered the Episcopalian ministry. He was professor of church history in the General Theological Seminary, New York city, from 1861 to 1864. He published "The Exercise of Faith," (1851,) "History of the Church," (1860; enlarged, 1872,) and other works, which gave him a high place among the theologians of his church. Died in Baltimore, September 3, 1870. (See his "Collected Works and Life," by J. H. Hopkins, 3 vols., 1872–75.)

Mā-hā' Prāl'yą, [modern Hindoo pron. mą-hā' prŭl'yą,] (i.e. the "great end" or "great destruction,") a term applied to the final consummation of all things, which, it is supposed, will take place after a hundred years of Brahma have elapsed, in which each day (with its night) is reckoned as 8640 millions of our years. At the time referred to, all the gods, including Brahma, as well as all creatures, will be annihilated; Brahm, the eternal, self-existent Spirit, will alone remain.

Mahdee, Mahdy, or Mahdî, Al, ăl mäh'dee, (Mohammed, mo-hăm'mĕd,) the third Abbasside caliph of Bagdâd, succeeded his father, Al-Mansoor, in 775 A.D. He waged war against the Greeks with such success that the empress Irene sued for peace. He died in 785, and was succeeded by his son Hâdee, (or Hady.)

Mahdi, Et., ĕl mä'dee, (Arabic for "the well-directed,") the title of a prophet and deliverer of Islam foretold by Mohammed; also the assumed title of Mohammed Ahmed, known to Europeans as "The False Prophet of the Soudan," who was born near Dongola, Nubia, in 1842. He worked in his youth as a boat-builder at Khartoom, and engaged in the traffic in wild animals for European menageries. He learned to read and write after becoming an adult, taught school at Khartoom, and subsequently established himself at Tamaniat as an interpreter of the Koran. Afterwards he went with some disciples to reside on the island of Aba, in the White Nile, where, by strict seclusion and austerity for six years, he acquired great fame as a holy man and was visited by pilgrims. In 1881 he announced himself by proclamation as the expected Mahdi, claiming to have all the physical signs prophesied of that personage. On the overthrow of Arabi Pasha in 1882 he acquired great ascendency in the Soudan, took possession of Sennaar, Kordofan, and Darfur, raised immense forces, and annihilated, in November, 1883, near El Obeid, the Egyptian army commanded by Hicks Pasha. In 1884 his power extended to the Red Sea, he waged war with the British at Suakim and vicinity, blockaded General Gordon at Khartoom, rejecting the title of "Sultan of Kordofan" offered him by Gordon, and forced England to send an expedition under Lord Wolseley to Khartoom for the relief of Gordon. Khartoom fell and Gordon was killed January 26, 1885. El Mahdi died June 22, 1885.

Mahé de la Bourdonnais, mȧ'ȧ' deh lȧ boor'do-nȧ', (Bernard François,) a distinguished French naval officer, born at Saint-Malo in 1699. About 1718 he entered the service of the French East India Company. He was appointed Governor-General of the Isles of France and Bourbon in 1734, and received command of a squadron in 1741. War having begun between France and England, he repulsed an English fleet near Madras, and captured that place, in 1746. He quarrelled with Dupleix, governor of the French possessions in Hindostan, who refused to give up Madras, which La Bourdonnais by treaty had agreed to restore to the English. Having been recalled to France, where he arrived in 1748, he was confined in the Bastille three years, and then tried and acquitted. His talents and virtues are praised by Saint-Pierre in the preface to "Paul and Virginia." Died in 1754 or 1755.

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd, mäh-mōōd', I., Sultan of Turkey, born in 1696, was the son of Mustafa II. He succeeded his uncle, Ahmed (Achmet) III., in 1730. In 1734 he began a war against the Russians, who were assisted by the Austrians. The latter made peace and gave up Belgrade to Turkey in 1739. Soon after that date he made a treaty of peace with Russia. Mahmood left the direction of affairs to his ministers. Died in December, 1754.

See Von Hammer, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs;" Levesque, "Histoire de la Russie."

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd II., Sultan of Turkey, a younger son of Sultan Abdool Hâmid, was born July 20, 1785. His youth was passed in seclusion or confinement and in literary pursuits. During the reign of his brother, Mustafa IV., the deposed Sultan, Selim III., was his fellow-captive, and initiated him in those projects of reform which he himself had failed to effect. In July, 1808, Mustafa was deposed by the military, and Mahmood was proclaimed Sultan at one of the most critical periods in the history of the Ottoman empire. The pashas of Asia and Africa had rendered themselves nearly independent of the Sultan, and the disaffection of the Janissaries threatened a revolution in the capital. He began the work of reform in the army, which he ordered to be organized after the European system. In November, 1808, the Janissaries rebelled, attacked the Sultan's palace, and proclaimed Mustafa. Mahmood suppressed this dangerous revolt by the execution of Mustafa and his heirs, after which he remained the only surviving prince of his race.

A war with Russia, in which the Turks had been defeated, was terminated by a treaty of peace in May, 1812. He pursued his projects of reform with courage and energy, amidst the violent opposition of his subjects. About 1822 began a general insurrection of the Greeks, who, after a war of several years, were liberated from the Turkish yoke. During this war he continued his bold innovations against the old customs and traditions; he dressed himself in the European fashion, and finally accomplished his most important measure,—the destruction of the Janissaries, who had instigated a formidable insurrection in the capital. The next day (June 15) the standard of the prophet was unfurled, and all good Mussulmans were summoned to arms. The Janissaries were outnumbered and speedily overpowered, and many thousands of them were killed. On the 16th an edict was issued for the abolition of their organization.

On the 20th of October, 1827, Mahmood's fleet was defeated and all-but annihilated at Navarino by the allied French, English, and Russians, who fought there for the liberty of Greece. Mahmood is censured for rashness in renewing the war with Russia in 1828. The Russian general Diebitsch defeated the Turks at Shumla, crossed the Balkan, and took Adrianople in 1829. The existence of the Turkish empire was in peril; but, through the mediation of England and other powers, the Sultan obtained peace (September, 1829) by paying a large sum of money and resigning the sovereignty of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Servia. In 1832 he was involved in war with Mehemet Ali of Egypt, whose army, commanded by his son Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) gained a decisive victory at Konieh, (December, 1832.) Russia interposed to protect Mahmood against his rebellious vassal. The Ottoman empire was apparently on the verge of dissolution, when the Sultan died, in June, 1839, and was succeeded by his son, Abdŏŏl-Mejeed.

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd, mȧH′mōōd′, (Abool-Kâsim-Yemeen-ed-Dowlah, or Abûl-(Aboul-) Kâsim-Yemîn-ed-Daulah, ā′bōōl kā′sim yĕh-meen′ ed-dŏw′lȧh,) one of the most celebrated of all the Mohammedan conquerors, the founder of the Gaznevide dynasty, and the first who established a permanent Moslem empire in India, was born at Gazna (or Ghiznee) in 967 A.D. He was the son of Sabŭktageen, whom he succeeded as governor of the province of Candahar, (or Gazna.) At an early age he distinguished himself while fighting under his father against the enemies of Nooh, (or Nouh.) the Samanide sovereign of Persia, from whom he received the title of Seif-ed-Dowlah, ("Sword of the State.") But afterwards, having been ill treated by Mansoor, a successor to Nooh, he overthrew the throne of the Samanides, and established his empire over a vast territory, including what is now called Affghanistan, besides an extensive region in the northeastern part of Persia. But, still unsatisfied, he resolved on the subjugation of the countries beyond the Indus. During a reign of rather more than thirty years, he made no fewer than twelve expeditions into India, besides carrying on several important wars in Central Asia. He extended his conquests not only over the whole of the Punjâb, but penetrated as far as Bundelcund on the east and Guzerat on the south. Moore, in his beautiful poem of "Paradise and the Peri," gives a striking picture of Mahmood's sanguinary and desolating career through Hindostan Apostrophizing India, he says,

> "Land of the sun! what foot invades
> Thy pagods and thy pillared shades?
> 'Tis he of Gazna,—fierce in wrath
> * * * * * *
> He comes, and India's diadems
> Lie scattered in his ruinous path.
> His bloodhounds he adorns with gems
> Torn from the violated necks
> Of many a young and loved sultana;
> Maidens within their pure zenana,
> Priests in the very fane he slaughters,
> And chokes up with the glittering wrecks
> Of golden shrines the sacred waters."
> Lalla Rookh.

It is related by Ferishta, a celebrated Moslem historian, that, having heard of the immense riches deposited in the temple of Somnâth, famous throughout all India for its sanctity, Mahmood determined to take possession of that place. The priests of Somnâth had boasted that, if he dared approach their holy shrine, he would receive from the avenging gods the just reward of his temerity. The temple stood on the extremity of a point of land in Guzerat, and was surrounded on three sides by the sea. It was defended by the Hindoos with all the courage of religious enthusiasm and all the obstinacy of despair. But nothing could withstand the valour of the fierce invaders. Mahmood, having entered the temple, was about to demolish a gigantic image, the object of the idolatrous worship of the Hindoos. The Brahmans, in great trepidation, offered him an immense sum of gold if he would spare their idol. Some of his officers advised him to accept the ransom; but his zeal as a true Moslem forbade such a compromise. He smote the image and broke it to pieces. It proved to be hollow, and a countless treasure of diamonds, rubies, and pearls was poured from its cavity upon the ground, thus richly rewarding the incorruptible zeal of the conqueror, and at the same time explaining the pious liberality of the Brahmans. In the extensive wars which Mahmood carried on in Central Asia, after his first expedition into India, he appears to have been mainly indebted for his success to the elephants used in his army. It is related that on one occasion Ilij (or Elich) Khân, a Turkish prince, invaded Khorassân with a large army. Mahmood hastily assembled an inferior force, which was accompanied, however, by five hundred elephants. The hostile armies met near Bŭlkh, (or Balkh,) in the vicinity of the river Amoo, or Oxus. Mahmood was mounted on a superb elephant, which, during the heat of the battle, rushed forward, and, seizing with his trunk the chief standard-bearer of the Turks, hurled him into the air. The other elephants followed the example of their great leader: with their trunks they lifted the horsemen from their saddles and dashed them on the ground, so that the Turkish army was soon broken and put to a total rout. Later, the military establishment of Mahmood is said to have comprised no fewer than thirteen hundred elephants and more than fifty thousand horse.

Along with great military talents and a fierce, unconquerable energy and courage, Mahmood possessed some virtues of a more exalted kind. A woman from a distant province, it is said, complained one day to the Sultan that her son had been killed and her property carried off by robbers. He replied that it was impossible for him to prevent all disorders in a region so remote. "Why, then," said the woman, "do you conquer kingdoms which you cannot protect, and for which you will have to answer at the day of judgment?" Far from resenting the freedom of this rebuke, he immediately took effective measures for establishing order in that distant part of his dominions. After his Indian conquests he not only greatly embellished Gazna, which still continued to be the capital of his empire, so that it rivalled, it is said, the most splendid cities of the East, but he showed himself a patron of science and literature, especially of poetry. It was during his reign that Firdousee, (or Firdausî,) the greatest of all the poets of Mohammedanism, flourished. (See FIRDOUSEE.) Seven other distinguished poets, according to Von Hammer, lived at his court and chanted his praises. Mahmood was the first, it is said, of the great Moslem rulers who employed the Persian language in official documents. Died in 1030.

Mahmood (Mahmoud or Mahmûd) II., surnamed NÂSIR-OOD-DEEN, (NÂSIR-OUD-DĪN,) nȧ′sir ōōd-deen′, (i.e. "Defender of the Faith,") an eccentric though able Sultan of Delhi, who ascended the throne in 1246. After the death of his father, Altmish, (ȧlt′mish,) he was imprisoned by his step-mother, and remained in confinement several years. During this period he voluntarily earned his bread by copying manuscripts. Even after he was raised to the throne he continued, it is said, to earn his subsistence by his pen. As a king he was distinguished for his ability, justice, and liberality; he was a patron of learning, the protector of his people, and a friend of the poor. He was a successful general, and speedily reduced several insurrections which broke out during his reign. Contrary to the custom of Moslem princes, Mahmood had but one wife, whom he required to be as industrious as himself, and to perform all the homely duties of housewifery like the meanest of her subjects. Her majesty, having one day burned her fingers while cooking, begged Mahmood to let her have a maid to assist her; but he refused, saying he was but a trustee of the state and had no right to burden it with needless expenses. He used to say, "Those who will not work for their bread do not deserve it." Mahmood Nâsir-ood-Deen was a half-brother of the distinguished Sultana Ruzeea Begum. (See RUZEEA BEGUM.) He died after a reign of twenty years.

Mahmood (Mahmoud or Mahmûd) Shâh, (Nâsir-ed-Deen or -Eddyn, nâ'sĭr ed-deen',) Emperor of Hindostan, was the son of Mohammed III. He ascended the throne of Delhi in 1394, and was a feeble ruler. His reign was a disastrous period of intestine wars and anarchy. Timur (Tamerlane) invaded India, defeated the army of Mahmood in 1399, and took Delhi. A few years later, Mahmood returned to Delhi, but he obtained but little power. He died in 1413, being the last of his dynasty.

Ma-hom'et* [Fr. pron. mȧ'o'mȧ'] or Mohammed (mo-hăm'mĕd) I., Emperor or Sultan of the Ottomans, born in 1374, was a younger son of Bayazeed (Bajazet) I., who was defeated by Tamerlane at Ancyra in 1401. At this time he was governor of Amasia, of which the victor left him in possession. Mahomet and his brother Moosa (Mousa) having appealed to arms for a decision of their claims to the throne, the latter was killed in battle in 1413. Mahomet restored the Ottoman empire to its former stability, subjected the Bosnians and Servians, and was the first Sultan that disputed with the Venetians the empire of the sea. He died in 1421, and was succeeded by his son, Amurath II.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs."

Mahomet or Mohammed II., styled THE GREAT, the son of Amurath II., was born in 1430, and succeeded his father in 1451. Having raised an army of about 300,000 men, he attacked Constantinople, defended by the Greek emperor Constantine Palæologus. After a siege of fifty-five days, the city was taken by storm on the 29th of May, 1453, and Constantine was killed fighting in the breach. Great numbers of the Greek citizens were massacred by the orders or permission of the victor, who in 1456 returned to Adrianople, his former capital. In that year he was defeated at Belgrade by the Hungarian chief Huniades. He conquered Trebizond from David Comnenus in 1461, and afterwards acquired by his arms Bosnia, and several islands in the Archipelago. In 1465 he was defeated by Scanderbeg in Albania. He waged successful wars against the Venetians and the Persians, (1470–78,) and invaded Italy in 1480. Death arrested his progress to further conquest in 1481, and delivered Christian nations from a formidable adversary. He left the throne to his son, Bayazeed (Bajazet) II.

Mahomet or Mohammed III., Sultan of Turkey, was born about 1568, and succeeded his father, Amurath III., in 1595. He put his brothers to death in the first days of his reign. He was a feeble ruler, and preferred the pursuit of pleasure to his duties as a monarch. Among the chief events of his reign was a war with the emperor Rudolph in Hungary, where the Turks lost several towns. He died in 1603, and was succeeded by his son, Ahmed (Achmet) I.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs."

Mahomet or Mohammed IV., the son and successor of Ibrâheem I., was seven years old when his father was killed by the Janissaries in 1649. Having a ruling passion for the chase, he permitted the grand vizier, Mahomet Köprili, to direct the affairs of the empire. That able minister took Lemnos and Mitylene from the Venetians in 1660, and about the same time waged war against the Austrians in Hungary. After several victories, the Turks were defeated at Saint Gothard on the Raab in 1663, and the war was suspended by a treaty. In that year Köprili died, and his son Ahmed (Achmet) became grand vizier. He took the capital of Candia in 1669, after a long siege. In 1683 a Turkish army of about 200,000 men under Cara Mustafa invaded Austria and besieged Vienna, from which the emperor Leopold fled without offering battle. After a siege of nearly two months, John Sobieski marched to the relief of the city, and put the Turks to a total rout. In consequence of this and other later reverses, Mahomet was deposed in 1687, and was succeeded by his brother, Solyman II. Mahomet was imprisoned until his death, in 1691.

Mahon, mȧ'ôn', (PAUL AUGUSTIN OLIVIER,) a French physician, born at Chartres in 1752. He wrote "Médecine légale," (3 vols., 1802.) Died in 1801.

Ma-hone', (WILLIAM,) an American Senator, was born near Monroe, Southampton county, Virginia, December 1, 1826. He graduated at the Virginia Military Institute in 1847, and became a civil engineer and railroad-president. He entered the Confederate army as colonel in 1861, and rose to be major-general, winning great distinction as a fighting corps-commander. After the war he resumed the railway-presidency. Entering the field of politics, he combined the Republican and Readjuster parties of Virginia, and from 1881 to 1887 occupied a seat in the United States Senate. Died Oct. 8, 1895.

Ma-ho'nў, (FRANCIS,) an Irish writer and wit, born about 1805, wrote under the assumed name of "Father Prout." He contributed many able articles to "Fraser's Magazine," which were published separately in 1860. He also wrote as correspondent for several daily journals of London. Died in 1866.

Mahudel, mȧ'ü'dĕl', (NICOLAS,) a French antiquary, born at Langres in 1673. He practised medicine in Paris for many years. He wrote a "Treatise on the Ancient Medals or Coins of Spain," (1725,) and several antiquarian treatises inserted in the records of the Academy of Inscriptions. Died in 1747.

Mahul, mȧ'ül', (ALPHONSE JACQUES,) a French political writer, born at Carcassone in 1795. He published a valuable work entitled "Annuaire nécrologique, ou Supplément annuel et Continuation de toutes les Biographies," (6 vols., 1821–26.) Died August 25, 1871.

Mai, mȧ'ee or mī, (ANGELO,) CARDINAL, a celebrated Italian critic and philologist, born at Schilpario, in the province of Bérgamo, on the 7th of March, 1782. He became an excellent classical scholar, and about 1808 was admitted as an associate in the Ambrosian Library of Milan, which was rich in ancient manuscripts. He applied himself to the task of deciphering palimpsests, and discovered portions of Cicero's orations and other classic works which had never been printed. In 1819 he was appointed chief librarian of the Vatican at Rome. The discovery which made the greatest sensation was that of six books of Cicero, "De Republica," which he published, with able critical notes, in 1822. These books, which had been lost since the twelfth century, were found by him in the Vatican. Among the monuments of his critical sagacity and patient research are three collections, entitled "A New Collection of Ancient Authors, produced from the Library of the Vatican," ("Scriptorum Veterum nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita," 10 vols. 4to, 1825–38,) "Classic Writers published from the Manuscripts of the Vatican," ("Classici Scriptores ex Codicibus Vaticanis editi," 10 vols., 1828–38,) and "New Library of the Fathers," ("Nova Bibliotheca Patrum," 6 vols., 1845–53.) He was raised to the dignity of cardinal in 1838, was chosen a foreign associate of the French Institute in 1842, and librarian of the Roman Church in 1853. Died in September, 1854.

Maikof, Maikov, Maikoff, or Maikow, mī-kof', (VASIL IVANOVITCH,) a Russian soldier and poet, born at Yaroslaf in 1725. He obtained some reputation for humour and comic power by his "Yelisei, or Bacchus Enraged," a burlesque poem. He also wrote several dramas and fables. Died in 1778.

Mailáth or Majláth, mī'lȧt, (JÁNOS NEPOMUK,) COUNT, an eminent Hungarian poet and historian, was born at Pesth in 1786. He was employed many years in the civil service of Austria. In the affairs of Hungary he was identified with the conservatives, or adversaries of Kossuth. He published, in German, two important works, a "History of the Magyars," (1828–31,) and a "History of the Austrian Empire," (1834–50.) The revolution of 1848 deprived him of his official employment as judex curiæ at Pesth, and reduced him to extreme poverty. He and his daughter Henrietta drowned themselves in Lake Starnberg, in Bavaria, in 1855. He left several poems and translations. He was highly respected as a man.

Maintenon, de, deh mǎnt'nôn', (François d'Aubigné.) Marquise, a French lady, whose life was marked by romantic adventures and surprising vicissitudes, was born in 1635, in the prison of Niort, (where her father, Constant d'Aubigné, was detained.) She was a granddaughter of the eminent author T. A. d'Aubigné. Having become a poor orphan, she was constrained by her guardians to abjure Calvinism. To escape the miseries of dependence on her unkind godmother, she married in 1652 Scarron the burlesque poet and wit, who was infirm and deformed in person. His house was a fashionable resort of the most brilliant wits and noblesse of Paris. He died in 1660, leaving her again destitute of resources except her rare beauty and talents. Her eyes are described as dark, intensely spiritual, and inexpressibly lustrous. She received a pension of 2000 livres from the queen-mother for several years preceding the death of the latter, in 1666.

About 1670 Madame Scarron was selected as governess of the Duc du Maine, a son of Louis XIV. and Madame de Montespan. The king presented to her the estate of Maintenon in 1674, after which she was called Madame de Maintenon. She gradually gained a complete ascendant over Louis, and was secretly married to him in 1685. The marriage was never formally avowed by him. "It would be hard to name any woman," says Macaulay, "who, with so little romance in her temper, has had so much in her life. . . . A just understanding; an inexhaustible yet never redundant flow of rational, sprightly conversation; a temper of which the serenity was never for a moment ruffled; a tact which surpassed the tact of her sex as much as the tact of her sex surpasses the tact of ours: such were the qualities which made the widow of a buffoon first the confidential friend and then the spouse of the proudest and most powerful of European kings." Madame de Sévigné describes her society as "truly delicious."

She laboured assiduously to convert the king to vital religion. Louis transacted business with his ministers in her apartment, discussed the most important questions in her presence, and often asked her advice in these terms: "Qu'en pense votre Solidité?" ("What does your Solidity think about it?") He was once dissuaded by her from the cruel purpose of burning the city of Treves. As the king grew old and fretful, her task of entertaining him became very arduous. "I have seen her," says Mlle. d'Aumale, "divert the king by a thousand inventions for four hours together, without repetition, yawning, or slander." She founded a good school for girls at Saint-Cyr. She died in 1719. Her letters and other works have been published by M. Lavallée, in 10 vols., (1854 et seq.) This edition includes "Souvenirs de Mme. de Caylus," and "Mémoires de Mlle. d'Aumale."

Maitland, (JOHN,) of Thirlestane, first Lord Maitland, an eminent Scottish statesman, born about 1540, was the second son of Sir Richard Maitland, noticed below, and grandfather of the Duke of Lauderdale. He was appointed keeper of the privy seal in 1567. For his loyalty to Queen Mary he was proscribed by the dominant party about 1570 and imprisoned several years. In 1584 he was made secretary of state, and became in fact the chief minister of James VI. He was appointed chancellor of Scotland in 1586 or 1587, and created Baron Maitland in 1590. He is praised for his moderation and integrity as well as for his talents. Several of his Latin epigrams have been published. Died in 1595.

Maitland, (Rev. SAMUEL ROFFEY,) D.D., F.R.S., an able English essayist and writer on ecclesiastical history, etc., was born in London in 1792. He was librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury from 1837 to 1848. He was author of numerous essays on theology, morals, etc. Among his principal and most popular works is "The Dark Ages: being a Series of Essays intended to Illustrate the State of Religion and Literature in the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Centuries," (1844.) He aims to prove that those ages were not so dark as they are commonly represented. Died in 1866.

Maitland, (Sir WILLIAM,) of Lethington, Lithington, or Lidington, an able Scottish minister of state, was the eldest son of Sir Richard, noticed above. In 1558 he became principal secretary to Mary of Guise, queen-regent; but in 1559 he joined the Protestant chiefs who had taken arms against her. He was restored to the office of secretary of state by Mary Queen of Scots in 1561. Though not a Catholic, he enjoyed the favour and confidence of the queen, who sent him on several embassies to Queen Elizabeth. After Mary was imprisoned, (1567,) he adhered to her cause, and united with the Duke of Norfolk in an effort to save her. Having failed in an attempt to mediate between the two hostile parties, in 1570 he declared openly for the queen. His enemy, Regent Morton, took him prisoner, and would probably have hung him if Maitland had not died soon after, as some suppose, by his own hand, in 1573. "All the contemporary writers," says Robertson, "mention him with an admiration which nothing could have excited but the greatest superiority of penetration and abilities." "His name," says Burton, "was a by-word for subtlety and state-craft. Yet, . . . if we look at his life and doings, we do not find he was one of those who have left the mark of their influence upon their age. . . . He had great abilities, but they were rather those of the wit and rhetorician than of the practical man." ("History of Scotland," vol. iv. pp. 55–57.) Hume styles Maitland "Secretary Lidington." Queen Elizabeth called him "the flower of the wits of Scotland."

He has also written largely on political and moral questions, and is the leading social reformer in India. He has made an earnest crusade against infant marriages and enforced widowhood in Hindostan.

Malabranca, mā-lā-brăn'kā, (LATINO,) an Italian Dominican, called also Frangipani, was a nephew of Pope Nicholas III. He was made Bishop of Ostia and Velletri in 1278. His diplomatic talents were employed and approved by several successive popes. Died about 1294. The celebrated hymn "Dies Iræ" is attributed to him by many writers.

Malacarne, mā-lā-kar'nā, (MICHELE VINCENZO,) an Italian surgeon, born at Saluzzo in 1744. He contributed by his works to the progress of science in Italy. He was professor of surgery at Padua from 1794 until his death, in 1816. Among his works is a treatise on Encephalotomy.

Mal'a-chī, [Heb. מַלְאָכִי,] the last of the minor Hebrew prophets, is supposed to have prophesied about 420 B.C. Nothing is positively known of his history. The name signifies "angel," or "messenger of the Lord." The book of Malachi is the last book of the Old Testament, in the order of time as well as of position.

Malachowski, mă-lă-kov'skee, (CASIMIR,) a Polish general, born in 1765. He had the chief command at Warsaw when that place was taken by the Russians in 1831. Died in 1845.

Malachy (mal'a-kĭ) II., or Maelsechlainn, a king of Ireland, the last of the Hui Neill dynasty who was undisputed over-king of the whole island. He gained the throne in 980, and soon after won a great battle at Tara over the Danes of Dublin, Man, and the Isles. In 989 he took Dublin. He had, in later years, continual warfare with Danes and Irish vassals alike, and in 1001 submitted to Brian Boroihme.

Malachy, SAINT, (in Irish, MAELMAEDOG UA MORGAIR,) also called Imar Malachy, an Irish archbishop, born at Armagh about 1095, of a noble race. He became about 1127 Bishop of Connor and Dromore, where he did much to introduce the Roman obedience. In 1129 he was promoted to be Archbishop of Armagh, but actually held that see only from 1134 to 1137, when he took the bishopric of Down. While at Rome in 1139 he was made papal legate a latere, with authority to visit and reform the Irish Church. In 1148 he convened a national council at Inis Phadrig, and in the same year went to meet the pope at Clairvaux, where he died, in the arms of Saint Bernard, November 2, 1148. The celebrated "Prophecy of Saint Malachy regarding the Lives of Future Pontiffs" was not written by him.

Malagrida, mā-lā-gree'dā, (GABRIELE,) an Italian Jesuit, born in the Milanese in 1689. He removed to Portugal, became a popular preacher, and wrote several works. He was suspected of complicity in the attempt to assassinate the King of Portugal, (1758,) and was convicted of heresy, for which he was burned in 1761.

Malaguti, mā-lā-goo'tee, (FRANÇOIS,) a distinguished chemist, born at Bologna in 1802. Having settled in France, he studied in the laboratory of Gay-Lussac, and became in 1850 professor of chemistry at Rennes. He published several valuable works, among which is "Lessons of Agricultural Chemistry." Died April 25, 1878.

Mal'a-la, Mal'e-la, or Mal'e-las, [Gr. Μαλάλα or Μαλέλα,] called also JOHN OF ANTIOCH, was the author of a Greek chronicle which extends from the creation to the year 566 A.D. It was first printed by Chilmead, at Oxford, in 1691. The time and place of his birth and death are not known. He was, perhaps, the same as John of Antioch the Scholastic.

See CAVE, "Historia Literaria."

Malan, (SOLOMON CÆSAR,) D.D., a Swiss-English clergyman and linguist, born at Geneva in 1812, was educated in England, graduating at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1837. He went to Calcutta and became a professor in Bishop's College, but returned to Oxford, took priest's orders in the English Church, and attained various preferments, being a prebendary of Sarum from 1871 to 1875. He published a vast number of translations from Oriental languages, (Chinese, Armenian, Georgian, Coptic, Geez, Russian, Japanese, etc.,) very often of works of much interest in connection with liturgical and doctrinal questions. He was also gifted as an artist, musician, and naturalist. He is said to have conversed fluently in twenty-five languages and to have been able to translate over one hundred. For awhile he ranked as the greatest living polyglot scholar, but was subsequently rivalled by Leitner in this regard. Died in 1894.

Malapert, mȧ′lȧ′pair′, (CHARLES,) a Flemish poet and geometer, born at Mons in 1581. He became a Jesuit, and a professor of mathematics in various colleges. He published Latin poems, and several works on geometry. Died in Spain about 1630.

Malaspina di Sannazaro, mȧ-lȧ-spee′nȧ dē sȧn-nȧd-zȧ′ro, (LUIGI,) MARQUIS, an Italian writer and political economist, born at Pavia in 1754. He founded a school of fine arts in his native city. Died in 1834.

Malatesta, mȧ-lȧ-tēs′tȧ, a noble Italian family, which acquired the lordship of Rimini in the thirteenth century, and furnished several leaders of the Guelph party. MALATESTA II. and GALEOTTO MALATESTI, sons of Pandolfe I., began to reign over Rimini in 1335. They had a great military reputation, and next to the Visconti were perhaps the most powerful princes of Italy. The former died in 1364, and Galcotto in 1385, leaving two sons, CARLO and PANDOLFO III. These two became able generals, and commanded the army of Visconti, Duke of Milan, from 1393 to 1408. Carlo, who was Lord of Rimini, died without issue in 1429. The descendants of Pandolfo III. possessed Rimini until 1528, when it was added to the papal dominions.

Malatesta, (BATTISTA,) an Italian lady of eminent talents, was married in 1405 to Galeotto Malatesta, Seigneur of Pésaro. She taught philosophy in public, made Latin orations before the emperor and pope, and wrote some admired verses.

Malaval, mȧ′lȧ′vȧl′, (FRANÇOIS,) a French mystic, born at Marseilles in 1627, became blind in infancy, but studied Latin with success. He published, besides several prose works of a mystical character, "Poésics spirituelles," ("Spiritual Poems.") Died in 1719.

Măl-bōne′, (EDWARD G.,) an American portrait-painter, born at Newport, Rhode Island, in 1777. He visited Europe in 1801 in company with Washington Allston, but returned the same year to America, where he soon acquired a high reputation in his art. Died in 1807.

Malchus, von, fon mȧl′kŭs, (KARL AUGUST,) BARON, a German writer, born at Mannheim in 1770, was appointed minister of the interior in the kingdom of Westphalia in 1813. He published several works on political economy. Died in 1840.

Malcolm (mȧl′kọm) I., King of Scots, the son of Donald IV., succeeded his cousin, Constantine III., in 938 A.D. He was killed by some of his own subjects who had revolted; but the date of this event is not known.

Malcolm II., King of Scotland, was the son of Kenneth III. He began to reign in 1003, and resisted several hostile incursions of the Danes with success. He died in 1033, leaving two daughters, one of whom was the mother of Duncan I.

Malcolm III., surnamed CANMORE, ("Great Head,") was the son of King Duncan, whose virtues and tragical fate are commemorated in Shakspeare's "Macbeth." When Duncan was killed, in 1040, Malcolm escaped to England. (See MACBETH.) He returned with an army, defeated Macbeth, and ascended the throne in 1057. About 1090 a war commenced between William II. of England and Malcolm, who was killed in battle at Alnwick Castle in 1093. His sons Alexander and David became kings.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. i. chap. xi.

Malcolm IV., King of Scotland, was born about 1140, and succeeded his grandfather, David I., in 1153. He made peace with Henry II. of England by ceding to him Northumberland. He died in 1165, and was succeeded by his brother William.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. ii. chaps. xiii., xiv.; BUCHANAN, "Rerum Scoticarum Historia."

Malcolm, mȧl′kọm, (JAMES PELLER,) an engraver and antiquary, born in Philadelphia about 1768. He visited Europe in his youth, and became a student in the Royal Academy of London. He published "Londinum Redivivum; or, The Ancient History and Modern Description of London," (1802–05,) "Seventy Views taken within the Compass of Twelve Miles round London," (1811,) and other works. Died in 1815.

Malcolm, mȧl′kọm, (Sir JOHN,) G.C.B., a British general and eminent historian, born in Dumfriesshire, Scotland, in 1769. In his youth he went to India as a cadet in the army of the Company. After performing an important political mission to Persia, (1799,) he was appointed to the presidency of Mysore in 1803. He was minister-plenipotentiary to the court of Persia in 1809 and 1810. Having collected information respecting Persia, he went to England in 1812, and published a valuable "History of Persia" (1815) from the earliest times to the date of publication. He returned to India in 1817, obtained the rank of brigadier-general, and, as second in command, distinguished himself at the battle of Mehidpoor, where Holkar was defeated. For several ensuing years he governed Malwa and the adjacent provinces in a manner which is highly commended. He returned to England in 1821, with the rank of major-general, was appointed Governor of Bombay in 1827, and resigned that post about the end of 1830. Sir John published, besides other works, a "Political History of India," (from 1784 to 1823,) and left a "Life of Lord Clive," which appeared in 1836. He was a brother of Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm. Died in 1833.

Malcolm, (Sir PULTENEY,) G.C.B., a British admiral, born near Langholm, Scotland, in 1768, was a brother of the preceding. He entered the navy in 1778, fought against the French in the West Indies, and was made a post-captain in 1794. He escorted the army of Sir Arthur Wellesley to Portugal in 1808, and obtained the rank of rear-admiral in 1813. In 1816 and 1817 he was commander-in-chief of the Saint Helena station, where his duty called him into intercourse with Bonaparte, who expressed himself much pleased with his manners and conduct. He was promoted to the rank of full admiral in 1837. Died in 1838.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement.)

Măl′cọm, (HOWARD,) D.D., a Baptist divine, born in Philadelphia in 1799, was one of the founders of the American Tract Society and of the American Sunday-School Union. In 1835 he visited India and China, and on his return published "Travels in South-Eastern Asia," (1839.) He published a "Dictionary of the Bible," which had an extensive circulation, and other religious works. Died March 25, 1879.

Malczewski, mȧl-chĕv′skee, written also Malczeski, (ANTONI,) an excellent Polish poet, born in Volhynia about 1792, was a son of a general in the Russian service. He received a French education, and entered the army in 1811. Having quitted the army in 1816, he travelled for some years, and is said to have been the first Pole that ascended Mont Blanc. His reputation is founded on a single poem, entitled "Maria; a Tale of the Ukraine," (Warsaw, 1826,) which is one of the most popular poems in the Polish language. He died poor at Warsaw in 1826.

See BIELOWSKI, "A. Malczewski," etc., 1843.

Maldachini-Pamfili, mâl-dâ-kee'nee pâm-fee'lee, (Donna OLIMPIA,) an Italian woman, noted for her ambition, vices, and political influence, was born at Viterbo in 1594. She was married to a man whose brother, J. B. Pamfili, was elected pope in 1644 and assumed the title of Innocent X. Died in 1656.

Mâl'den, (HENRY,) an English writer, born about 1800, graduated at Cambridge in 1822. He became professor of Greek in University College, London, about 1830. Died July 4, 1876.

Maldonado, mâl-do-nâ'do, (LOPEZ,) a Spanish poet of the sixteenth century, was contemporary with Cervantes, who mentions him with eulogy.

See LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe."

Maldonado, (LORENZO FERRER,) a navigator, who was born probably in Spain. He wrote a narrative of a voyage which he made, or pretended to have made, from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Behring Strait in 1588. The majority of geographers have discredited his story.

See F. DE NAVARRETE, "Historia de la Nautica."

Maldonat, mâl-do-nât', [Lat. MALDONA'TUS,] (JUAN,) a celebrated Spanish theologian, born in Estremadura in 1534. Having entered the order of Jesuits, he went to Paris about 1564, and and acquired a high reputation as a professor of theology. He is said to have been a person of great talents, learning, and piety, and to have written Latin with much purity. He wrote, besides other works, "Commentaries on the Four Evangelists," (1596,) which, says Hallam, "have been highly praised by theologians of the Protestant side." Died in 1583.

Malebranche, mâl'brŏnsh', [Lat. MALEBRAN'CHIUS] (NICOLAS,) a French metaphysical philosopher of great eminence, was born in Paris on the 6th of August, 1638. His habits in youth were retired and studious. He became a priest of the Oratory in 1660, and was a zealous Cartesian in philosophy, which was his favourite study. In 1674 he produced the first volume of his admirable and original "Search for Truth," ("Recherche de la Vérité,") which was quickly and highly appreciated. New and enlarged editions of it rapidly followed. The general design of this work is to demonstrate the harmony of the Cartesian philosophy with revealed religion. His style is eminently pure, perspicuous, and elegant, having, says Fontenelle, "all the dignity which the subject requires, and all the grace or ornament which it could properly receive." "He was," says Hallam, "a warm and almost enthusiastic admirer of Descartes, but his mind was independent, searching, and fond of its own inventions; he acknowledged no master, and in some points dissents from the Cartesian school. . . . The fame of Malebranche, and, still more, the popularity in modern times of his 'Search for Truth,' have been affected by that peculiar hypothesis, so mystically expressed, the seeing all things in God, which has been more remembered than any other part of that treatise." "He bears a striking resemblance," adds the same critic, "to his great contemporary Pascal. Both of ardent minds, endowed with strong imagination and lively wit, sarcastic, severe, fearless, disdainful of popular opinion and accredited reputations. . . . But in Malebranche there is a less overpowering sense of religion; his eye roams unblenched in the light before which that of Pascal had been veiled in awe. He has less energy, but more copiousness and variety." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") "This ingenious philosopher and beautiful writer," says Mackintosh, "is the only celebrated Cartesian who has professedly handled the Theory of Morals. . . . The manner in which he applied his principles to the particulars of human duty is excellent. He is perhaps the first philosopher who has precisely laid down, and rigidly adhered to, the great principle that virtue consists in pure intentions and dispositions of mind, without which actions, however conformable to rules, are not truly moral." He was involved in a long and intemperate controversy with Arnauld on the theory of ideas and on the doctrine of grace.

In 1687 he combined all the parts of his system, and developed them more fully, in "Conversations on Metaphysics and Religion," ("Entretiens sur la Métaphysique et la Religion.") He was author of other religious and mystical works, among which are "Christian and Metaphysical Meditations," (1683,) and a "Treatise on Morality," ("Traité de Morale," 1684.) He gave proof of his profound attainments as a geometer by a "Treatise on the Communication of Motion." Died at Paris in October, 1715.

Malermi, mâ-lêr'mee, or Malerbi, mâ-lêr'bee, (NICOLÒ,) an Italian translator, born in Venice in 1422. He produced (1471) the first Italian version of the Bible that was ever printed.

Malesherbes, de, dĕh mâl'zârb', (CHRÉTIEN GUILLAUME DE Lamoignon—lâ'mwân'yŏn',) a meritorious French judge and philanthropist, born in Paris in 1721, was a son of Chancellor de Lamoignon. At the age of twenty-four he was chosen a counsellor in the Parliament, and in 1750 became president of the Cour des Aides. He was directeur de la librairie, or censor of books, from 1750 to 1768, and was praised for his liberality or indulgence by Rousseau, Voltaire, and the Encyclopædists. He acquired great popularity by his defence of the Parliament against the ministry about 1772. In 1775, having been indicated by the public voice, he was appointed a colleague of Turgot in the new ministry, as minister of the king's household and of the police, but he resigned in 1776, when Turgot was dismissed. He was elected to the French Academy in 1775, though he had not produced any purely literary work. He was author of treatises on rural economy and finances, and of a "Memoir on the Liberty of the Press." When Louis XVI. was arraigned by the Convention in 1792, Malesherbes generously offered to him his services as counsel, which were accepted. This act of fidelity having rendered him suspected by the terrorists, he was executed in April, 1794. His virtues are warmly eulogized by both royalists and republicans.

Malet, de, dĕh mâ'lā', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) a French general and conspirator, born at Dole in 1754. About 1806 he was dismissed from the service, and went to Paris, where he plotted against Bonaparte, and was imprisoned from 1808 to 1812. Having formed another conspiracy, he announced at the barracks, in Paris, on the 24th of October, 1812, that Bonaparte had died in Russia, and that he (Malet) had been appointed governor of Paris by the senate. By forged orders he imposed on the prefect of Paris, made Savary prisoner, and shot General Hullin. At this crisis his audacity was baffled by Laborde, who made him prisoner. Malet and his accomplices were shot, after a summary process, in October, 1812.

Malgaigne, mål'gañ', (JOSEPH FRANÇOIS,) a French medical writer and surgeon, born in Paris about 1806. He published, besides other works, a "Treatise on Surgical Anatomy and Experimental Surgery," (2 vols., 1838.) Died in 1865.

Malherbe, de, deh mål'lårb', (FRANÇOIS,) a distinguished French lyric poet, born at Caen about 1555. He served several campaigns in the civil wars of the League, and married Madeleine de Carriolis in 1581. In 1587 he composed his first work, "The Tears of Saint Peter." An "Ode to the Queen Marie de Médicis" (1600) was the foundation of his fame. He came to Paris a few years later, and enjoyed the patronage of Henry IV. during the life of that prince. Malherbe was called the poet of princes and the prince of poets. He died in 1628. "He was," says La Harpe, "the first [French] model of the noble style, and the creator of lyric poetry. He has its enthusiasm, its movements, and its tournures." "Malherbe," says Hallam, "gave a polish and a grace to the lyric poetry of France, which has rendered his name celebrated in her criticism. In general, we find in his poems neither imagery nor sentiments that yield us delight." Comparing him with Horace, the same critic remarks, "He is far from deficient in that calm philosophy which forms the charm of the Roman poet." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Malibran, mål'le'brôn', (MARIA FELICITÀ,) a celebrated singer and actress, born in Paris in 1808, was the daughter of Manuel Garcia, a Spanish tenor singer. She made her début in London in 1825, and in 1826 visited New York, where she married M. Malibran, a banker. After he had become a bankrupt, she separated from him and went to Paris, where she performed with complete success in 1828. In Italy, England, and Germany she also obtained triumphs almost unexampled in the history of artistes. Her voice was a mezzo-soprano of great volume. She was very successful as an actress. She died in England in 1836, soon after a second marriage with M. de Bériot, a violinist.

See FÉTIS, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens;" "Memoirs of Madame Malibran," by the COUNTESS OF MERLIN.

Malietoa Laupepa, King of Samoa, succeeded to the throne in 1880. A rival, Tamasese, was favoured by the Germans, who seized and exiled Malietoa and sought to establish a protectorate. The exile was brought back in response to the protests of Great Britain and the United States, and restored to the throne November 9, 1889. Died August 22, 1898.

Malik (mål'ik) or Melik, mêl'ik, El Adel, I., (Seif-ed-Deen Aboobeker Mohammed, or Saif-Eddyn Aboubekr Mohammed, sîf ed-deen' å'bōō-bĕk'ẹr mo-hâm'med,) Sultan of Egypt and Damascus, born at Baalbec in 1139, was a brother of the famous Saladin. He gained victories over the crusaders in 1174 and 1187. In 1201 he became Sultan of Egypt. He extended his dominions by conquest in Syria. Died in 1218.

See WEIL, "Geschichte der Chalifen," vol. iii.

Malik-Shâh, mål'ik shâh, written also Malek (Malec- or Melek-) Shâh, a famous Seljookide sovereign, the son of Alp-Arslân, whom he succeeded in 1072. Under Malik-Shâh the Seljookian empire reached its highest point of power and glory. His character, like that of his father, appears to have been singularly noble. His succession to the throne had been disputed by his brother Toortoosh, (Tourtousch.) Before giving battle to his rival, he asked his minister, Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk, as they came out of the mosque together, what he had prayed for. "I have prayed," answered the minister, "that God would give you the victory over your brother." "And I," said Malik-Shâh, "that God would take away my life and crown, if my brother is worthier to reign than I." Perhaps the only stain upon the character of this great prince is his having, at the instigation of his Sultana, the Khâtoon Tōōrkân, removed from office his minister, the illustrious Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk,* to whose wise administration the empire was chiefly indebted for its long-continued prosperity. Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk died soon after by the dagger of an assassin. Malik-Shâh survived his minister only a few months. He died in 1092.

Malinche or Malintzin. See MARINA.

Malingre, mål'lângr', (CLAUDE,) a French historian of little merit, born at Sens about 1580. He wrote several works on French history, which were not successful. Died about 1653.

Mallalieu, mal-la-lū', (WILLARD FRANCIS,) D.D., an American Methodist bishop, born at Sutton, Massachusetts, December 11, 1828. He graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1857, became a preacher in the same year, and for some time was presiding elder at Boston. In 1884 he was chosen a bishop.

Mallarmé, mal-lar-mé', (STÉPHANE,) a French poet, born at Paris in 1842. He became first known through a translation of Poe's "Raven." His "Divagations" appeared in 1896. He is a representative of the "decadent" school, employing odd words and constructions, and ignoring the laws of prosody.

Mal'la-ry, (CHARLES,) a Baptist minister, born in Poultney, Vermont, in 1801, removed to Georgia. He was one of the founders of Mercer Theological Seminary, at Penfield, Georgia. Died July 31, 1864.

Mallary, (ROLLIN CARLOS,) a lawyer, a brother of the preceding, was born in Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1784. He was a member of Congress from 1819 until his death, in 1831.

Mallemans de Messanges, mål'môn' dẹh mȧ'sônzh', (CLAUDE,) a French savant, born at Beaune in 1653. He was professor of philosophy for thirty-four years at the Collége du Plessis, Paris. He published "A Physical Treatise on the World," and other works. Died in 1723.

Malleolus. See HAMMERLEIN.

* This name, the only one by which he was known, signifies the "regulator of the state or kingdom."

Mal'lery, (GARRICK,) an American ethnologist, born at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, in 1831. He graduated at Yale College in 1850, was in the army in the civil war, was executive officer of the Signal Service Bureau 1870–76, and subsequently on the survey of the Rocky Mountain region. He retired from the army in 1879, when he became chief of the Bureau of Ethnology. He wrote various works and papers on the ethnology of the North American Indians. Died in 1894.

Mallet, mȧ'lȧ', (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) a French philosopher, born at Lille in 1807. He published, besides other works, "Études philosophiques," (2 vols., 1837–38,) which gained a prize of the French Academy. He wrote numerous articles in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale." Died March 28, 1876.

Mal'let or Malloch, mal'lok, (DAVID,) a Scottish poet and dramatist, born at Crieff, in Perthshire, about 1698, was the son of James Malloch. He removed to London about 1724, and changed his name to Mallet. In 1728 he produced "The Excursion," a poem, and in 1731 "Eurydice," a tragedy. He became intimate with Pope, who procured him a situation as travelling tutor. His tragedy "Mustapha" (1739) was performed with applause. About 1740 he was appointed under-secretary to Frederick, Prince of Wales. Among his other works are "Amyntor and Theodora," and a "Life of Bacon." He is censured for acting as the venal agent of Bolingbroke in an attempt to blast the memory of Pope, (1749.) Died in 1765.

Mallet, (EDME,) a French littérateur, born at Melun in 1713. He published an "Essay on the Study of Belles-Lettres," and translated into French Davila's "History." Died in 1755.

Mallet, mȧl'let, (FREDRICK,) a Swedish writer on science, born in 1728, was for many years professor of mathematics at Upsal. He published many treatises between 1752 and 1774, and co-operated with Bergman in a general description of the earth. Of this work Mallet wrote the astronomical part. Died in 1797.

Mallet, mȧ'lȧ', (JACQUES ANDRÉ,) called Mallet-Favre, a Swiss astronomer, born at Geneva in 1740, was a favourite pupil of Daniel Bernoulli. He became professor of astronomy at Geneva about 1770, and built an observatory there. He wrote memoirs on astronomy, mechanics, etc. for the Academy of Paris and the Royal Society of London, of which he was a member. Died in 1790.

Mallet, (PAUL HENRI,) a Swiss historian, born at Geneva in 1730. He taught French to the Prince-Royal of Denmark, (Christian VII.,) and returned to Geneva in 1760. He was appointed professor of history in the Academy of that city. Among his works (in French) are "Monuments of the Mythology and Poetry of the Celts," (1756,) "Memoirs on the Literature of the North," (6 vols., 1760,) and a "History of Denmark," (3 vols., 1777,) which is highly esteemed and has been translated into English, German, etc. Died in 1807.

His "Introduction à l'Histoire de Danemark" was translated into English, under the title of "Northern Antiquities," which is one of the most valuable works on Northern mythology.

See SISMONDI, "De la Vie et les Écrits de P. H. Mallet," 1807: HAAG, "La France protestante:" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale:" "Monthly Review" for March, 1771.

Mal'let, (ROBERT,) a British engineer and seismologist, born at Dublin, June 3, 1810. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1830. His numerous reports, papers, and catalogues on earthquakes (prepared by him with the aid of his son, Dr. J. W. Mallet) are of high importance. He invented several seismometers. His largest independent work is "First Principles of Observational Seismology," (2 vols., 1862.) Died in London, November 5, 1881.

Mallet-Dupan, mȧ'lȧ' dü'pȯN', (JACQUES,) a distinguished publicist and editor, born at Geneva in 1749. He became a resident of Paris in 1782, and editor of a journal called "Mercure historique et politique," which was very successful. In the Revolution he defended the royalist cause, and in 1792 was compelled to suspend the publication of the "Mercure," of which he had written the political editorials. He then became an exile, and in 1799 began to issue, in London, the "Mercure Britannique," which was ranked among the ablest political journals of that time. Died in England in 1800.

See "Mémoires et Correspondance de Mallet-Dupan," Paris, 1851.

Mallet-Prévost, mȧ'lȧ' prȧ'vō', (HENRI,) a scientific Swiss writer, born at Geneva in 1727. He published a valuable "Metrologic Manual, or Repertory of Weights, Measures, and Coins of Various Nations," (1802,) and a "Description of Geneva," (1807.) Died in 1811. He was a brother of Paul Henri Mallet, noticed above.

Malleville, de, deh mȧl'vēl', (CLAUDE,) a French minor poet, born in Paris in 1597, was one of the first members of the Académie Française. "He seldom produced a finished piece," says Hallam, "though not deficient in spirit and delicacy." His poems are sonnets, one of which is called "The Fair Early-Riser," ("La belle Matineuse.") Died in 1647.

Mallinkrot, von, fon mȧl'lĭn-krot', (BERNARD,) a German philologist, was dean of the chapter of Münster. He wrote, besides other works, a treatise "On the Rise and Progress of the Art of Printing." Died in 1664.

Malloch. See MALLET, (DAVID.)

Mal'ock, (WILLIAM HURRELL,) an English author, a nephew of the historian Froude, was born in Devonshire in 1849. He graduated with high honours at Balliol College, Oxford. Among his principal works are "Every Man his Own Poet," (1872,) "The New Republic," (1876, a satirical work which for a time attracted great attention,) "The New Paul and Virginia," (1877,) "Is Life Worth Living?" (1879,) "Labour and the Popular Welfare," (1893,) "Classes and Masses," (1896,) "Aristocracy and Evolution," (1898,) and several novels and volumes of poems.

Mal'ọ-rў, (STEPHEN R.,) an American Democratic politician, born about 1810. He was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Florida in 1850, and re-elected in 1856. He served as secretary of the navy of the Confederate States from March, 1861, to 1865. Died at Pensacola, November 9, 1873.

Malmesbury, EARL OF. See HARRIS, (JAMES.)

Malmesbury, mȧms'ber-e, (JAMES HOWARD HARRIS,) third EARL OF, a British Tory statesman, a grandson of the first Earl of Malmesbury, was born in 1807. He succeeded to the earldom at the death of his father, in 1841, before which he was styled LORD FITZHARRIS. In February, 1852, he was appointed secretary of foreign affairs in the Derby ministry, which was dissolved in December of that year. He again became foreign secretary under Lord Derby in 1858, and on the formation of the Liberal ministry in June, 1859, was succeeded by Lord John Russell. He edited the "Diaries and Official Correspondence of the First Earl of Malmesbury," (1844.) From 1866 to 1868 and from 1874 to 1876 he was lord keeper of the privy seal. Died May 17, 1889.

Malmesbury, (WILLIAM OF,) an old English historian, who is supposed to have been born in Somersetshire about 1095. He became a monk in the monastery of Malmesbury, where he held the office of librarian. His principal works are a "History of England from 450 to 1127," ("De Gestis Regum Anglorum,") "Recent History," ("Historia Novella,") wherein he relates events of which he was an eye-witness, and a "History of the English Prelates," ("De Gestis Pontificum.") These are highly prized for accuracy, veracity, and critical judgment. He died in or after 1143.

Malmström or Malmstroem, mȧlm'strŏm, (ELIS,) a Swedish poet, born in 1816. He published a collection of elegies entitled "Angelica," (1840,) and an epic poem of "Ariadne." Died at Stockholm in June, 1865.

Malombra, mȧ-lom'brȧ, (PIETRO,) a Venetian painter, born in 1556. He was successful in portraits and in historical pictures. Died in 1618.

Ma-lōne', (EDMUND,) an Irish critic, chiefly distinguished as an editor and commentator of Shakspeare, was born in Dublin in 1741. Having inherited an easy fortune, he removed to London and devoted himself to literature. He associated with Dr. Johnson, Burke, and other eminent authors. In 1790 he published his edition of Shakspeare, with commentaries. He excelled Steevens, a rival commentator, in candour and love of truth; but "neither seems," says Hallam, "to have had a full discernment of Shakspeare's genius." Malone published an edition of Sir Joshua Reynolds's works, with a Memoir of his Life, (1797,) and other works. He died in 1812, leaving unfinished an improved edition of Shakspeare, since published, (1821.)

See JAMES BOSWELL, "Biographical Memoir of Edmund Malone;" SIR JAMES PRIOR, "Life of Edmund Malone," 1860; "Monthly Review" for September, 1793.

Mal'o-ry, (Sir THOMAS,) a Welsh or English knight, born about 1430. He is noted as the compiler and translator (from the French) of the English "Morte Darthur," begun about 1461 and finished about 1470. He was probably a priest. His book was printed by Caxton in 1485. It is a noble prose epic, and its appearance marks an epoch in the history of English literature.

Malot, (HECTOR HENRI,) a French novelist, born near Rouen in 1830. He resided in London as a newspaper correspondent, and published a long series of novels, including his autobiographical "Le Roman de mes Romans," (1896.)

Malouet or Malhouet, mȧ'loo'ȧ', (PIERRE VICTOR,) a French statesman, born at Riom in 1740. In 1789 he was elected to the States-General, where he became prominent as a liberal royalist and co-operated with Clermont-Tonnerre. He took refuge in England in 1792, returned about 1802, and was chosen a councillor of state in 1810. Died in 1814.

Malouin, mȧ'loo-ăn', (PAUL JACQUES,) a French chemist and physician, born at Caen in 1701. He became professor of chemistry in the Jardin du Roi, Paris, in 1745, wrote many articles on that science for the "Encyclopédie," and published an esteemed work on "Medical Chemistry," (1750.) He was a member of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1778.

See CONDORCET, "Éloge de P. J. Malouin;" "Biographie Médicale."

Malpighi, mȧl-pee'gee, (MARCELLO,) [Lat. MARCEL'LUS MALPIG'HIUS,] a celebrated Italian anatomist and naturalist, born near Bologna in 1628. Having graduated as a physician in 1653, he became professor at Pisa in 1656, and at Messina about 1664. He published, between 1661 and 1665, treatises "On the Lungs," ("De Pulmonibus,") "On the Tongue," ("De Lingua,") and "On the Brain" ("De Cerebro.") Malpighi was the first who used the microscope in the study of anatomy. In 1670 he returned to Bologna, and wrote an important work on the anatomy of plants, "Anatome Plantarum," (1675,) a science which was first cultivated by Grew and Malpighi. He made discoveries in the structure of the skin and glands. In 1691 he was chosen chief physician to Pope Innocent XII. He died in Rome in 1694.

Malpighius. See MALPIGHI.

Malsburg, mȧls'bŏŏrg, (ERNST FRIEDRICH GEORG OTTO,) BARON, a German littérateur, born at Hanau in 1786, translated Calderon's dramas into German, and published a number of religious poems. Died in 1824

Mȧlt'bў, (EDWARD,) an English theologian, born at Norwich in 1770. He became Bishop of Durham in 1836, and published several volumes of sermons. Died in 1859.

See the "Monthly Review" for March, 1820.

Malte-Brun, mault'brŭn' or mȧl'tẹh-brŭn', (CONRAD,) a Danish author and geographer of great merit and celebrity, was born at Thister, Jutland, in 1775. His original name, MALTHE CONRAD BRUUN, (broon,) was changed by the French into Malte-Brun, by which he is now universally known. He had a great facility for learning languages, and wrote French with an ease and elegance which perhaps no other foreigner ever acquired. In his enthusiasm for liberty, he wrote some political articles, for which he was banished in 1796. He composed several admired odes; that on the death of Count Bernstorf is esteemed one of the finest in the Danish language. Induced partly by admiration of Napoleon, he became an adopted citizen of France about 1800. In 1806 he was engaged as one of the editors of the "Journal des Débats" of Paris, for which he wrote, during many years, able articles on foreign politics, history, languages, science, etc. Malte-Brun and Eyriès edited in 1808 the "Annals of Voyages of Geography and of History," ("Annales des Voyages de la Géographie et de l'Histoire.") Before this period he had devoted his attention chiefly to the science of geography, in which he surpassed all his predecessors by his happy union of philosophy with a highly poetic imagination. In 1810 he published the first volume of his great work, "A System of Universal Geography," ("Précis de la Géographie universelle,") the plan of which was too vast for one man to execute. The sixth volume was finished in 1825. Exhausted with excessive labour and study, he died in December, 1826, leaving his task unfinished. The language of this work is graphic, picturesque, and at times highly poetical. In order to complete the plan, two more volumes were subsequently added by M. Huot. There is a good English version of Malte-Brun's Geography, by J. G. Percival, the American poet and savant.

See BORY DE SAINT-VINCENT, "Notice biographique sur M. Malte-Brun," 1827; QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire;" ERSLEW, "Forfatter-Lexicon;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Malte-Brun, (VICTOR ADOLPHE,) a geographer, a son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1816. He became professor of history at Pamiers in 1838. He published a new edition of his father's Geography, (8 vols., 1852–55.) Died in 1889.

Mal'thus, (THOMAS ROBERT,) an English political economist, distinguished as the author of the Malthusian theory, was born near Dorking, Surrey, in 1766. He graduated as M.A. at Cambridge in 1797, took orders, and settled in a parish near his native place. In 1798 he controverted the theories of Godwin and others on the progress and perfectibility of human nature, in his "Essay on the Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society." Much attention was excited by his fundamental principle, that population tends to increase in geometrical progression, and that the supply of food and other necessaries of life can only be increased in an arithmetical progression. After exploring several countries of Europe in search of facts to confirm his system, he published in 1803 an enlarged edition of his essay. His principles were approved by many statesmen and political economists. From 1805 until his death he was professor of modern history and political economy in the college at Haileybury. He was author of an "Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent," (1815,) "Principles of Political Economy," (1820,) and other works. Died in 1834.

Maltitz, mȧl'tits, (FRANZ FRIEDRICH,) BARON, a Russian statesman, of German extraction, born in 1794, was appointed minister-plenipotentiary of Russia at the Hague. He was the author of poems and dramas, (in German,) and wrote a continuation of Schiller's "Demetrius."

Maltiz, mȧl'tits, (APOLLONIUS,) a littérateur and diplomatist, of German extraction, born in 1795, was ambassador from the Russian court to Lisbon. He wrote tales, plays, epigrams, and poems. Died March 2, 1870.

Maltiz, mȧl'tits, (GOTTHILF AUGUST,) BARON, a German writer, born at Königsberg in 1794, published several dramas, and a political satire entitled "Pepper-Corns," ("Pfefferkörner.") Died in 1837.

Mȧl'tọn, (THOMAS,) an English geometer and artist, born between 1735 and 1750, lived in London. He published about 1776 a "Complete Treatise on Perspective," which is highly commended. He also published various engravings, designed by himself, among which were "Views of London." Died about 1802.

Maltzan, von, fon mȧlt'sȧn, (HEINRICH KARL ECKHARDT HELLMUTH,) Baron von Wartenburg-Penzlin, a German traveller and ethnologist, born near Dresden, September 6, 1826. He studied law in Jena. He travelled largely in North Africa, Arabia, etc., and published "Three Years in the North-West of Africa," (1863,) "Meine Wallfahrt nach Mecca," (1865.) "Reise in Tunis und Tripolis," (1870,) "Reise in Arabien," (1873,) and other works, containing much valuable linguistic and scientific material. Died by suicide at Pisa, February 22, 1874.

Malus, mȧ'lüs', (ETIENNE LOUIS,) an eminent French optician and military engineer, was born in Paris in 1775. He became a student of the Polytechnic School about 1794, and, aided by the tuition of Monge, made great progress in mathematics. "Of all the pupils who then attended that school," says Biot, "he showed himself the first in application and talents." In 1798 he accompanied as engineer the army to Egypt, and was employed at the sieges of Jaffa, Cairo, etc. He returned to France in 1801, devoted his leisure to analytic optics, and published an excellent "Traité d'Optique." In 1808 the Institute proposed a prize for a memoir on the double refraction of crystals. Malus won this prize, after a multitude of experiments, in which he happened to make one of the most important discoveries of physical science,—viz., the property or phenomenon which he named the "polarization of light." He was elected to the Institute, and in 1811 received the Rumford medal from the Royal Society of London for the discovery just named. He was chosen examiner for physics and geometry at the Polytechnic School. "While thus surrounded," as Biot observes, "with numerous friends who appreciated his genius, honoured with eminent positions to which his talents, services, and probity had raised him, already celebrated for great discoveries," etc., he died prematurely, in February, 1812.

See ARAGO, "Notices biographiques," vol. iii.; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Malvasia, mȧl-vȧ-see'ȧ, (CARLO CESARE,) a learned Italian antiquary, born at Bologna in 1616. was versed in law, medicine, and theology. He became professor of law in the University of Bologna, and published, besides numerous other works, one on the Bolognese painters, "Felsina Pittrice, Vite e Ritratti de' Pittori Bolognesi," (1678.) Died in 1693.

See CRESPI, "Vita di C. C. Malvasia."

Malvenda, mȧl-vẽn'dȧ, (TOMAS,) a learned Spanish Dominican, born at Xativa in 1566, was a good Hebrew scholar. He lived at Rome and Valencia. He wrote a "Commentary on the Old Testament," with a literal Latin version, and a "Commentarius de Paradiso," ("Account of Paradise.") Died in 1628.

Malvezzi, mȧl-vĕt'see, (VIRGILIO,) MARQUIS, an Italian author, born at Bologna in 1599. He served in the Spanish army, and was sent as ambassador to England by Philip IV. of Spain. He wrote, besides other historical and political works, "A Life of Romulus," and a "Life of Tarquin the Proud." Died in 1654.

Malvoisine. See MAWMOISINE.

Mälzel or Maelzel, mĕlt'sȩl, (JOHANN NEPOMUK,) a German mechanician, noted for ingenuity, was born at Ratisbon in 1772. He made an automaton, called the Panharmonicon, which could play many instruments at once, and invented a metronome, which is useful to musicians. He afterwards lived in the United States. Died at sea, July 21, 1838.

Mamachi, mȧ'mȧ-kee, (TOMMASO MARIA,) a monk, born in the isle of Scio in 1713. He went to Rome in 1740, and became professor in the College of the Propaganda. He wrote "On the Oracles of the Heathen," (1738,) and "Christian Antiquities," ("Origines et Antiquitates Christianæ," 4 vols., 1749–55.) Died in 1792.

Mambelli, mȧm-bel'lee, (MARCANTONIO,) an Italian grammarian, born at Forlì in 1582; died in 1644.

Mambrun, mŏN'brŭN', (PIERRE,) a French critic and Latin poet, born at Clermont-Ferrand in 1600. He became a Jesuit, and taught philosophy at Caen and theology at La Flèche with a high reputation. Taking Virgil for his model, he composed Latin eclogues, an epic poem called "Constantinus," (1658,) and an "Essay on Epic Poetry." His epic obtained a transient favour with the public. Died in 1661.

Mameli, mȧ-ma'lee, (GOFFREDO,) an accomplished poet, called "the Italian Körner," was born at Genoa in 1826, and was killed at Rome in 1849 while fighting the French. The patriotic song "Fratelli d'Italia" is his most celebrated piece.

Mą-mẹr'cus [Gr. Μάμερκος] was tyrant of Catana when Timoleon invaded Sicily in 344 B.C. He formed an alliance with Hicetas and the Carthaginians against Timoleon, by whom he was defeated and executed about 338 B.C.

Mamoon, Mamoun, or Mâmûn, Al, ȧl-mȧ'mōōn', (Abool- (or Abûl-) Abbâs-Abdallah, ȧ'bōōl' ȧb'bȧs' ȧb-dȧl'lȧh,) the seventh Abbasside caliph, was born at Bagdâd in 786 A.D., and was the son of Haroun-al-Raschid. After defeating his brother Alameen in battle, he ascended the throne in 813. His reign was disturbed by rebellions excited by princes of the race of Alee and others. He enforced by persecution the dogma that the Koran was created and not eternal, which was considered heretical by many of the Moslem doctors. While he was prosecuting a war against the Greek emperor Theophilus in Cilicia, he died, in 833, leaving his extensive empire to his brother Motassem. Mamoon was celebrated as a patron of science and literature, and was praised by Eastern writers for his talents and liberality. He founded colleges, collected Greek and Hindoo manuscripts, which were translated at his expense, and invited the scholars and savants of all nations to his capital, (Bagdâd,) then the great centre of learning and science in the world.

Ma-nas'seh or Ma-nas'sēs, [Heb. מנשה; Fr. MANASSÉ, mȧ'nȧ'sȧ',] a Hebrew patriarch, born in Egypt about 1712 B.C., was the son of Joseph and Asenath. (See Genesis xli. 51.) His descendants formed two half-tribes among the tribes of Israel, one on the east, the other to the west, of the river Jordan.

Manasseh, [Heb. מְנַשֶּׁה,] King of Judah, the son of Hezekiah, was twelve years of age when he succeeded his father, in 697 B.C. Having forsaken the true worship and become an open idolater, he was taken captive by the King of Assyria, and detained at Babylon some years. He repented, and was restored to his kingdom. After a reign of fifty-five years, he died, and was succeeded by his son Amon.

See II. Kings xxi. and II. Chronicles xxxiii.

Ma-nas'sēs, (CONSTANTINE,) a Greek writer of the twelfth century, wrote a general chronicle, in verse, from the creation to the year 1081 A.D. It is of some value for the history of the Byzantine empire.

Ma-nas'sēs Ben-Jo'seph-Ben-Is'rael, a learned Jewish rabbi, born in Spain about 1604. He resided mostly at Amsterdam. He wrote, besides other works, "On the Harmony of the Scriptures," ("De Convenientia Locorum Sanctæ Scripturæ," etc.,) and "The Hope of Israel," ("Spes Israelis.") Died in 1659.

Man'by, (Captain GEORGE WILLIAM,) a British officer, born in Norfolk in 1765. Having entered the army, he obtained the rank of captain. About 1808 he invented a mode of saving life by shooting from a mortar a rope to mariners shipwrecked near the coast. Several crews having been rescued by this means, the government provided mortars and other apparatus at numerous stations, and presented to Captain Manby several sums, amounting to £7000. Died in 1854.

Man'chęs-ter, (Sir EDWARD MONTAGU,) EARL OF, an English general, born in 1602, was the son of Henry, first Earl of Manchester. He was styled Lord Kimbolton before his father's death, (1642.) Having joined the opposition to the court about 1640, he acquired great popularity. In 1642 he was impeached for treason, with Hampden and four other members of Parliament, whom the king attempted to seize in the House. He was appointed a general of the army of Parliament in 1643, and co-operated with Fairfax at the victory of Marston Moor, (1644.) Manchester and Essex were charged by Cromwell with temporizing and with being averse to a decisive victory of the popular party, and the command was taken from them by the "Self-denying Ordinance," (1644.) At the restoration (1660) he was appointed lord chamberlain by Charles II. Died in 1671. "He was distinguished," says Hume, "by humanity, generosity, and every amiable virtue."

See CLARENDON, "History of the Rebellion;" LODGE, "Portraits of Illustrious Personages."

Manchester, (HENRY MONTAGU,) first EARL OF, an English statesman, father of the preceding, was born in Northamptonshire about 1562. He became lord chief justice about 1617, and lord treasurer of England in 1620. He was created Earl of Manchester in 1626. Died in 1642.

Manchoo or Manchu Khan. See MANGOO.

Mancinelli, măn-che-nel'lee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian poet, born at Velletri in 1452. He taught grammar at Rome, Venice, etc., and wrote several works on grammar. He was author of "The Mirror of Morality," ("Speculum de Moribus,") "Carmen de Vita sua," (a poem on his own life,) and other poems. Died about 1506.

Mancini, măn-chee'nee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born in the Romagna in 1725. He worked in Rome, and was reputed one of the best painters of his time. Died in 1758.

Mancini, (HORTENSIA,) Duchess of Mazarin, an Italian lady of remarkable beauty, born at Rome in 1646, was a niece of Cardinal Mazarin, who refused to give her in marriage to Charles II. of England, then an exile. She made in 1661 an ill-assorted marriage with the French Duc de la Meilleraie, who then received the title of the Duc de Mazarin. She soon separated from him, and lived many years in London, where her house was the resort of men of wit and pleasure. Died in 1699. According to Macaulay, she was one of the sultanas of Charles II. in the last years of his reign.

See A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (LOUIS JULES) See NIVERNAIS.

Mancini, (MARIA,) Princess of Colonna, a sister of Hortensia, noticed above, was born in Rome in 1640, and was a daughter of Cardinal Mazarin's sister. Louis XIV. was so well pleased with her in his early youth that he was inclined to marry her; but Mazarin sent her to a convent. In 1661 she was married to Prince Colonna. She ran away from him in 1672, obtained a divorce, and became a nun. Died about 1715.

See SAINT-SIMON, "Mémoires;" A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (MARIA ANNA,) Duchess of Bouillon, a niece of Mazarin, was born in Rome in 1649. She was married in 1662 to the Duke of Bouillon, and became the mother of the Prince de Turenne. She was the first person who patronized La Fontaine the fabulist, who has praised her in his letters. She died in 1714.

See VOLTAIRE, "Siècle de Louis XIV;" A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (OLYMPIA,) Countess de Soissons, another sister of the preceding, born about 1642, was married to Eugene Maurice of Savoy, Count de Soissons. She was the mother of the celebrated Prince Eugene, commander-in-chief of the Austrian armies.

Mancini, (PAOLO,) the founder of the Academy of Umoristi, was born at Rome. He was the grandfather of Hortensia and Maria Mancini, noticed above. Died in 1635.

Măn'co Ca-păc' (or mȧng'ko kȧ-pȧk') was, according to tradition, the first Inca of Peru. He instituted the worship of the sun, of which he pretended to be the offspring, founded the city of Cuzco, and gave laws to the natives of that region, whom he found in a savage state. He is supposed to have flourished about 1000 A.D. (See INCA.)

Manco Capac, Inca of Peru, was the son of Huayna Capac. He became heir to the throne after Atahualpa was killed by Pizarro, in 1533. He made a treaty with Pizarro, but, finding himself treated as a captive, he escaped in 1535, raised a native army, and besieged Cuzco. The approach of Almagro forced him to retire. He was assassinated by a Spaniard about 1544.

Mandar, mŏN'dȧr', (MICHEL PHILIPPE,) better known as THÉOPHILE MANDAR, a French political writer and revolutionist, born at Marines in 1759. He took an active part in several insurrections in Paris from 1789 to 1793. It is said that in the councils of his party he attempted to arrest the massacre of September, 1792, and proposed a dictatorship for that purpose. He wrote "The Genius of Ages," and other poems, and several political works. Died in 1823.

Măn'dă-rā, [modern Hindoo pron. mŭn'da-ra,] in the Hindoo mythology, a famous mountain used by the gods in churning the ocean. (See KÛRMA.)

Mandel, măn'dęl, (EDUARD,) a German engraver, born at Berlin in 1810. His portrait of Charles I., after Van Dyck, is esteemed a master-piece. He obtained a medal of the first class at the Exposition of Paris in 1855. Died October 26, 1882.

Mandelot, de, dẹh mŏNd'lo', (FRANÇOIS,) a French fanatic and general, born in Paris in 1529. He was commandant at Lyons, and co-operated with the king in the massacre of the Protestants in 1572. Died in 1588.

Mander, van, vän män'dẹr, (CAREL,) an eminent Flemish painter, poet, and biographer, born at Meulebeke, near Courtrai, in 1548. He received lessons in art from Lucas de Heere of Ghent, and about 1574 went to Rome, where he worked three years and gained a high reputation as a painter of landscapes and of frescos. In 1583 he settled at Haarlem, where he remained twenty years and founded an academy of painting. Among his master-pieces are "Adam and Eve in Eden," and "The Adoration of the Magi." He translated the "Iliad," and Virgil's "Bucolics" and "Georgics." He was author of "Dina," a drama, and of other poems. His best literary work is "Lives of Flemish and Italian Painters," (1604,) which is highly esteemed. Died in 1606.

Mander, van, (CAREL,) a painter, a son of the preceding, was born at Delft in 1580. He worked at the court of Denmark. Died about 1665.

Man'dẹ-vĭlle, de, (or dẹh mŏNd'vĕl',) (BERNARD,) an ingenious author, born at Dort, in Holland, about 1670. He became a resident of London, where he practised medicine before he appeared as an author. In 1714 he published a poetical satire called "The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves Turned Honest." This having been censured as immoral by William Law and other writers, he published, with notes, a new edition, with the title of "The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits," (1723.) It was denounced by the grand jury of Middlesex as a pernicious book. (For an analysis of this remarkable work, see the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," article "Mandeville, B. de.") He also wrote "Free Thoughts on Religion, the Church, and National Happiness." Died in 1733.

See BIRTH, "Life of Bernard de Mandeville;" "Biographia Britannica."

Mandeville, de, dẹh man'dẹh-vĭl', (Sir JOHN,) a famous English traveller, born at Saint Alban's about 1300. In early life he practised medicine. According to his own account, in 1327 he went to Palestine, enlisted in the army of the Sultan of Egypt, and afterwards travelled in various countries of Asia. He spent about three years in Cambalu, (Peking,) and returned home in 1360. In point of fact, he probably never went farther east than Jerusalem. He wrote an account of his travels, which obtained a wide reputation. His book abounds in marvellous and extravagant stories, partly borrowed from Pliny and from mediæval romances, and largely made up from the writings of Odoric, Carpini, Boldensele, and other travellers. Mandeville's famous story is in fact a hoax. It is said that he died in 1371; but there is really nothing known as to this date. Mandeville is absurdly called "the first English prose writer;" but he wrote in French. The Latin versions, the delightfully quaint (but very inaccurate) old English version, and the Italian translation are by unknown hands.

See DISRAELI, "Amenities of Literature:" SPRENGEL, "Geschichte der geographischen Entdeckungen;" "Retrospective Review," vol. iii., (1821.)

Mandosio, män-do'se-o, (PROSPERO,) a mediocre Italian writer, born at Rome. He compiled a work called "Bibliotheca Romana," consisting of biographies of about five hundred Roman writers, ancient and modern, (2 vols., 1682–92.) Died about 1700.

Manes. See LARES.

Mā'nēs, Mā'ni, or Manichæus, man-e-kee'us, the founder of the heretical sect of Manichæans, was probably born in Persia in the early part of the third century. He corrupted the Christian religion by mixing with it some doctrines of the Magi, teaching that the world is made or ruled by two eternal and opposing principles of light and darkness. He rejected the Old Testament, professed that he was the Comforter promised in John xvi., held the doctrine of metempsychosis, and published a book which he pretended contained a revelation from heaven. Manes obtained proselytes in Persia, Egypt, and other countries. Saint Augustine was a zealot of this sect in his youth. The Oriental accounts of Manes, differing widely from those of the Greek or Catholic writers, state that he was born of the race of Magi, lived in Susiana, was an adept in painting and other arts, produced a "gorgeous picture-book," which was received as sacred by his disciples, and was put to death by Varanes, King of Persia, about 272 A.D. The Latin and Greek writers say that his original name was CUBRICUS, that he derived his doctrines from an impostor named Terebinthus, and was punished with death for his heresy, in 277 A.D.

Man'ẹ-tho, [Gr. Manéthōn and Manethṓs; Fr. MANÉTHON, mä'nä'tôN',] a celebrated Egyptian writer and priest, was a native of Sebennytus, or, according to some accounts, of Diospolis, and flourished in the reigns of Ptolemy Soter and Ptolemy Philadelphus, between 300 and 250 B.C. He was reputed to have attained the highest possible degree of wisdom. He was keeper of the sacred archives at Heliopolis, and author of several important works, among which was a "General History of Egypt," in Greek. This is lost, except fragments preserved by Josephus in his "Reply to Apion," and by George Syncellus. He was the first Egyptian who wrote in Greek an account of the religion, history, and chronology of Egypt. A poem, in Greek, on the influence of the stars, entitled "Apotelesmatica," (which has come down to us entire,) is sometimes ascribed to Manetho, but was probably written by a later author.

Man'frẹd, [It. MANFREDI, män-frä'dee; Lat. MANFRE'DUS; Fr. MAINFROI, mäN'frwä',] King of Naples, born about 1234, was a natural son of the emperor Frederick II., from whom he seems to have inherited noble or at least popular qualities. By the will of Fredcrick, who died in 1250, Manfred became Regent of the Two Sicilies until the arrival of Conrad, the lawful heir, who was in Germany. Conrad died in 1254, leaving an infant son, Conradin or Corradino, and Manfred again became regent. A rumour of Conradin's death having obtained credence, Manfred was proclaimed king in 1258, and he refused to relinquish the royal power when that report was proved to be false. He became an ally of the Ghibelines of Northern Italy against the Guelphs. Urban IV., who became pope in 1261, and who had long been an enemy to the house of Suabia, excommunicated Manfred, and offered the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Charles of Anjou, a brother of Louis IX. of France. Charles accepted it as a fief of the see of Rome, marched an army into Naples, and gained a victory, in which Manfred was killed, in 1266.

Manfredi, mân-frā'dee, (Bartolommeo,) an Italian painter, born at Mantua about 1580. He was a pupil of Caravaggio, whom he imitated so well that good judges mistook his works for those of his master. Among his productions is "A Party of Men drinking." Died in Rome in 1617.

See Lanzi, "History of Painting in Italy."

Manfredi, (Eustachio,) an eminent Italian geometer and astronomer, born at Bologna in 1674. He was appointed professor of mathematics in the University of Bologna in 1698, and astronomer to the Institute of that city in 1711. He published Ephemerides from 1715 to 1750, "Elements of Chronology," (1744,) "Institutes of Astronomy," ("Instituzioni astronomiche,") and other works. Manfredi also wrote admired sonnets and canzoni. He was a foreign associate of the Academy of Sciences of Paris, and a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. Died in 1739.

Manfredi, (Gabriele,) born at Bologna in 1681, became professor of mathematics in Bologna in 1720. He succeeded his brother Eustachio in 1739 as superintendent of the waters. He wrote an able treatise "On Equations of the First Degree," and several Memoirs for the Institute of Bologna. Died in 1761.

See Montucla, "Histoire des Mathématiques."

Manfredini, mân-frà-dee'nee, (Federigo,) Marquis, an Italian minister of state, born at Rovigo in 1743. He became prime minister of the archduke Ferdinand of Tuscany in 1790. His prudent measures preserved Tuscany from invasion by the French until 1799, when Ferdinand and his minister were forced to retire into exile. Died in 1829.

Manfredus. See Manfred.

Man'gan, (James Clarence,) an Irish poet, born in Dublin in 1803. He became a solicitor's clerk. Overwork and misery drove him to drink and opium. Having found employment in the library of Dublin University, he acquired great learning. Died at Dublin, of intemperate habits, June 20, 1849. Among his works is "Anthologia Germanica," (2 vols., 1845.) John Mitchell in 1859 published a volume of his poems, ballads, and translations.

Mangeart, môn'zhâr', (Thomas,) a French numismatist and monk, born at Metz in 1695, wrote an "Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals," (1763.) Died in 1762.

Mangin, môN'zhân', (Charles,) a French architect, born near Meaux in 1721, designed several important edifices in Paris, among which were the Halle au Blé (Grain-Market) and the Church du Gros-Caillou. Died in 1807.

Mangin, (Jean Henri Claude,) a French advocate, born at Metz in 1786. He wrote several legal works. Died in 1835.

Manglard, môn'glâr', (Adrien,) a French painter of landscapes and marine views, was born at Lyons in 1695; died at Rome in 1760.

Mangles, mang'g'lz, (Captain James,) a British traveller, who obtained the rank of commander in the navy in 1815. In 1816, accompanied by Captain Irby, he began an extensive journey, in which they explored the Upper Nile, the ruined city of Petra, and the Dead Sea. They returned to England in 1820. See Irby, (Charles L.) Died November 18, 1867.

Man'goo' (or Mangou) Khan, written also Mengko and Moengke, Emperor or Grand Khan of the Mongols, was the son of Toolee, (Touli,) and grandson of Jengis Khan. He ascended the throne about 1250. His empire included Tartary, India, a part of China, and Persia. One of his armies, under his brother Kooblai Khan, subdued Thibet; and another army at the same time (1256) conquered in Persia the Ismaeelian dynasty. Two years later he took Bagdâd and made himself master of the caliph's dominions. While pursuing his conquests in China, he was killed in battle, in 1259. He was succeeded by his brother, Kooblai Khan.

Manigault, man'e-gō', ? (Gabriel,) a wealthy American merchant and patriot of the Revolution, born at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1704; died in 1781.

Mą-nil'I-ą Gens, the name of a plebeian Roman gens, which was not numerous and consequently was not divided into families. Marcus Manilius, who became consul in 149 B.C., was the first member of this gens that figures in history.

Mą-nil'ī-us, (Caius,) a Roman tribune, and partisan of Pompey. He was tribune of the people in 66 B.C. He proposed a bill called "Lex Manilia," granting to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates in place of Lucullus. On this occasion Cicero uttered his celebrated oration "Pro Lege Manilia."

Manilius, (Marcus or Caius,) a Latin poet, known as the author of an astrological poem called "Astronomica." His name is sometimes written Mallius or Manlius. Nothing is certainly known of his nativity or history; but he is supposed to have lived in Rome in the reign of Augustus or of Tiberius. His poem, first discovered by Poggio about 1410, is a work of much learning, and contains some fine passages, but is faulty in style.

See Scaliger, "Prolegomena in Manilium," 1600; F. Jacob, "De M. Manilio Poeta," etc., 1832.

Manin, mā-neen′, (DANIELE,) an eminent Italian patriot and statesman, born in Venice in May, 1804, was educated for the profession of advocate. He was a republican, and promoted the liberation of Venetia by legal means rather than by arms. In March, 1848, he proclaimed a republic at Venice, and became president of the provisional government. Having vainly opposed the annexation of Venetia to Piedmont, he resigned in July, 1848. He was soon recalled, and governed Venice as dictator during the siege, which lasted a year, and ended, after a heroic struggle, in August, 1849. He went into exile, and died in Paris in 1857. His remains were honoured with a magnificent public funeral, by order of the Italian Parliament, in the metropolitan church of Venice, in March, 1868.

Manin or Manini, mā-nee′nee, (LODOVICO,) the last Doge of Venice, was born about 1727. He was elected in 1788, a period when the republic manifested evident signs of approaching ruin. He refused to join Austria in a coalition against the French in 1792, and remained neutral in the war that ensued. Venice was invaded by the French in 1797, the form of the government was changed, and Manini retired to private life.

See DARU, "Histoire de Venise."

Manini, mā-nee′nee, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian writer on theology and history, was born at Ferrara in 1750; died in 1834.

Manini, (LODOVICO.) See MANIN.

Man′ley, (JAMES R.,) an American physician, born in the latter part of the eighteenth century, became professor in the Medical College of New York. Died in 1851.

Manley, (JOHN,) CAPTAIN, an American naval officer of the Revolution, born in 1734. He performed several important services. Died in Boston in 1793.

Man′ley, (MARY DE LA RIVIERE,) a popular English authoress, born in Guernsey about 1672, was the daughter of Sir Roger Manley. To procure a subsistence, she wrote "The Ruyal Mischief," (1696,) a tragedy, which was successful. Her next work was a romance called "Memoirs of the New Atalantis," containing severe strictures on some of the persons in power, which caused her to be prosecuted and imprisoned for libel. She wrote political articles for the Tory ministry between 1710 and 1714, and edited the "Examiner" with ability after Dean Swift had retired from the direction of that paper. She also left an autobiography, and some novels and plays remarkable for their gross indelicacy as well as for their literary power. Died in 1724.

See CIBBER, "Lives of the Poets."

Man′lĭ-a Gens, one of the most ancient and celebrated of the patrician gentes or tribes of Rome. The family names of the Manlii were Cincinnatus, Acidinus, Capitolinus, Torquatus, and Vulso. Among the eminent persons of this gens was Man′lĭ-us Cap-ĭt-o-lī′nus, (MARCUS,) who was elected consul in 392 B.C. In 399 the Gauls under Brennus captured Rome and besieged the Capitul, which Manlius and others defended. According to tradition, an attempt of the Gauls to surprise this fortress by night was defeated by Manlius, who was awakened by the clamour of a flock of geese. For this service he received the surname of CAPITOLINUS. He became a champion of the popular party, or plebeians, in 385, spent his fortune freely for the relief of those who were oppressed by debt, and was accused of aspiring to royalty. His enemy Camillus was appointed dictator, and Manlius, having been tried for treason and condemned to death by the patricians, was thrown from the Tarpeian rock in 381 B.C.

See LIVY, "History of Rome;" CICERO, "De Republica;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus."

Man′lĭ-us Tor-quā′tus, or, more fully, Ti′tus Man′lius Capitoli′nus Torqua′tus, a popular Roman hero, was the son of L. Manlius Imperiosus, who was dictator in 362 or 363 B.C. He signalized his filial affection by extorting from Pomponius an oath that he would desist from the prosecution of his father. In 359 he was elected a military tribune. He killed in battle a Gaul of gigantic stature and despoiled him of a chain, (torques,) from which he derived the surname TORQUATUS. He was appointed dictator in 353, and again in 349 B.C. Having been elected consul for the third time in 340, he defeated the Latins, and punished with death his own son, who had violated orders by fighting a single combat with one of the enemy.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books vii., viii.; AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus;" P. EKERMAN, "Dissertatio de T. Manlio Torquato," 1767.

Manlius Torquatus, (TITUS,) a Roman general, of the same family as the preceding, was consul in 235 B.C. Sardinia having been subjected by him in that year, the temple of Janus was shut, for the second time in the history of Rome, because the Romans enjoyed a universal peace. He was re-elected consul in 224, and made a speech against the motion to ransom the prisoners taken by Hannibal at Cannæ, (216.) In 215 B.C. he gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians in Sardinia. He was appointed dictator in 208, and died in 202 B.C.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii., xxiii., xxv., etc.

Man′lius Vul′so, (CNEIUS,) a Roman general, elected consul about 190 B.C. He conquered the Gauls of Galatia, and received the honour of a triumph in 186 B.C.

Man′lў, (BASIL,) a Baptist minister, born in Chatham county, North Carolina, in 1798. He became president of the University of Alabama in 1837. Died in 1868.

Mann, (HORACE,) LL.D., an eminent American educationist, born in Franklin, Norfolk county, Massachusetts, May 4, 1796. His father was a farmer in limited circumstances, so that Horace was obliged to procure by his own exertions the means of obtaining an education. The books to which he had access in early life, as he informs us, "were few, and their contents meagre and miserable." "My teachers," he adds, "were very good people, but they were very poor teachers." There was, however, no lack of hard work, and in summer his labours often encroached upon the hours which should have been devoted to sleep; yet, with all these disadvantages, his mind gave early proof of uncommon power and intense activity. He had earned his school-books, when a child, by braiding straw; and his severe and frugal life gave him the habit of depending solely upon himself for the gratification of all his wants. When about the age of twenty, he commenced the study of Latin, and in six months prepared himself to enter the sophomore class in Brown University, at Providence, Rhode Island, where he graduated with the highest honours in 1819. The subject of his discourse on that occasion was "The Progressive Character of the Human Race." This was always a favourite theme with him, and his first oration may be said to have foreshadowed his subsequent career as philanthropist and statesman. While at Providence he became acquainted with the young lady whom he afterwards married. She was the daughter of Dr. Messer, president of the university. In 1821 he entered the law school at Litchfield, and in 1823 was admitted to the bar. He commenced the practice of law at Dedham. He was elected in 1827 to the State legislature, and during his connection with that body was distinguished for the zeal with which he devoted himself to the interests of education and temperance. In the practice of his profession he had adopted the principle never to take the unjust side of any cause: it is said that he gained four out of five of all the contested cases in which he was engaged. The extraordinary influence which he exerted over the minds of the juries was owing in a great measure to the confidence which all felt in his honesty of purpose. In 1833 he removed from Dedham to Boston, and soon after was elected to the State Senate. In 1836, and again in 1837, he was chosen president of the Senate. About this time he became acquainted with Dr. W. E. Channing and Dr. S. G. Howe, for whom he ever afterwards cherished the sincerest respect and affection.

To his enlightened philanthropy and untiring efforts was due the establishment of the State Lunatic Hospital at Worcester. In 1837 he was elected secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, (then recently organized,) and was unanimously re-elected to the same position for eleven successive years. From the moment that he entered upon his new duties, he devoted himself to them with undivided attention and unremitting zeal. By his lectures and writings he awakened an interest in the cause of education that had never been felt before. Through his influence, important changes were made in the school laws of Massachusetts, and a thorough reform was effected in the educational system of the State.

In May, 1843, Mr. Mann married as his second wife Miss Mary Peabody, daughter of Dr. Nathaniel Peabody and sister-in-law of Mr. Hawthorne; and immediately afterwards he sailed for Europe, chiefly for the purpose of visiting European schools, particularly those of Germany. He returned to his native country in the autumn of the same year.

In the spring of 1848, Mr. Mann was elected to Congress, as successor to J. Quincy Adams, who had died in February of that year. His first speech in the House of Representatives was in advocacy of the right and duty of Congress to exclude slavery from the territories. He says, in a letter dated December, 1848, "I think the country is to experience serious times. Interference with slavery will excite civil commotion at the South. Still, it is best to interfere. Now is the time to see whether the Union is a rope of sand or a band of steel." In another letter, dated January, 1850, he says, "Dark clouds overhang the future; and that is not all: they are full of lightning." Again, "I really think if we insist upon passing the Wilmot Proviso for the territories that the South—a part of them—will rebel. But I would pass it, rebellion or not. I consider no evil so great as that of the extension of slavery." On the 7th of March, 1850, Webster delivered his great speech against the Wilmot Proviso. This led to an open rupture between him and Mann. Through the influence of Webster's friends, in the following November Mann failed by a single vote to obtain a re-nomination in the Whig convention. He, however, appealed to the people as an independent candidate, and was triumphantly re-elected.

In September, 1852, Mr. Mann was chosen president of Antioch College, at Yellow Springs, Ohio. On the same day he was nominated for Governor of Massachusetts by a convention of the Free Democracy (otherwise called the Free-Soil party) assembled at Lowell. Although not elected Governor, his popularity was shown by his vote running far ahead of that of the other Free-Soil candidates. He accepted the presidency of Antioch College, which under his able management attained a large measure of success. But the labours and anxieties of that responsible position proved at length too much for his health, never strong, and now undermined by a life of the most intense and unremitting activity. He died August 2, 1859.

Mann, măn, (THÉODORE AUGUSTIN,) ABBÉ, a Flemish writer and antiquary, born about 1740, resided at Brussels. He published a "Tableau of the Coins, Weights, and Measures of Different Nations," (1779,) a "Description of Brussels," (1785,) and other works. Died at Prague in 1809.

Mann, (TOM,) a British labour leader, born in Warwickshire in 1856. He worked in a mine as a boy, became an engineer, and went to London in 1871. In 1881 he became closely connected with the Trade Union movement, joined the Socialists in 1885, and took a leading part in managing the dock strike of 1890. He became president of several trade associations, and is the author of several works on Socialism, Trade Unionism, etc.

Manners. See RUTLAND, DUKE OF.

Manners, (JOHN.) See GRANBY, MARQUIS OF.

Man'ners, (JOHN JAMES ROBERT,) LORD, a second son of the Duke of Rutland, was born in 1818. He entered the House of Commons in 1841, and identified himself with the Tory party. He was first commissioner of the board of works for a short time in 1858–59, and obtained the same position in the Derby cabinet in July, 1866. He resigned in December, 1868. He was postmaster-general from 1874 to 1880.

Manners, (ROBERT,) LORD, a younger son of John, Marquis of Granby, was a brother of the fourth Duke of Rutland. He died of wounds received at a battle in the West Indies in August, 1782, where he commanded the ship Resolution.

Manners, (ROBERT WILLIAM,) LORD, an English general, born in 1781. He entered the army in 1798, served Wellington as aide-de-camp in the Peninsular war from 1808 to 1813, and was wounded at Waterloo, (1815.) In 1830 he obtained the rank of major-general. He was frequently elected to Parliament. Died in 1835.

Mannert, măn'nĕrt', (KONRAD,) a German writer, born at Altdorf in 1756, was the author of a "History of the Vandals," (1785,) "History of Bavaria," (1826,) and other works. Died in 1834.

Manni, măn'nee, (DOMENICO MARIA,) a distinguished Italian antiquary and printer, born at Florence in 1690. He published new editions of early Italian works, which he enriched with prefaces, notes, etc., and wrote valuable dissertations on the history of Florence. His "Historic Observations on the Seals of the Middle Ages" (30 vols. 1739–86) is a work of merit. Died in 1788.

See TOMITANO, "Elogio di D. M. Manni," 1789.

Manni, (GIANNICOLA,) an Italian painter, born at Perugia about 1478, was a pupil of Perugino. Died in 1544.

Man'ning, (HENRY EDWARD,) a Roman Catholic prelate, born in London in 1809, graduated at Oxford. He took orders in the Anglican Church, and became Archdeacon of Chichester in 1840. In 1851 he entered the priesthood of the Catholic Church. He was appointed Archbishop of Westminster in 1865. Among his works are "The Unity of the Church," (1843.) and "The Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes," (1860.) He took part in the Œcumenical Council which held its sessions in Rome from December, 1869, to May, 1870, and he maintained the dogma of papal infallibility. He was created cardinal in 1875. Died January 14, 1892.

Man'ning, (JAMES,) D.D., an American Baptist divine, born at Elizabethtown, New Jersey, in 1738, was the first president of Brown University, Rhode Island. Died in 1791.

Manning, (OWEN,) an English antiquary, born in Northamptonshire in 1721. He became Vicar of Godalming and rector of Peppercharrow, (1769.) He wrote the "History and Antiquities of Surrey," and completed Lye's "Saxon Dictionary." Died in 1801.

See W. BRAY, "Life of O. Manning," prefixed to the first volume of his "Antiquities of Surrey."

Manning, (THOMAS,) an English linguist, born in Norfolk in 1774. He resided for a long time in Thibet, and accompanied Lord Amherst to China in 1816. Died in 1840.

Mannini, măn-nee'nee, (JACOPO ANTONIO,) an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1646; died in 1732.

Mannlicher, von, (FERDINAND RITTER,) a German inventor, born at Mayence in 1848. After the use of the needle-gun at Sadowa in 1866 he began to experiment with rifles, and in 1885 produced a magazine rifle, which was adopted for the Austrian army.

Manno, măn'no, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Palermo in 1754; died in 1831.

Mannory, mă'no're', (LOUIS,) a French advocate, born in Paris in 1696. He published "Voltairiana," (1748,) and "Plaidoyers et Mémoires," (18 vols., 1759.) Died in 1777.

Mannozzi, măn-not'see, (GIOVANNI,) an excellent Italian fresco-painter, born at San Giovanni, near Florence, in 1590, was sometimes called GIOVANNI DA SAN GIOVANNI. He was a pupil of Rosselli. In 1621 he went to Rome, where he painted, in rivalry with Guido's "Aurora," a picture of "Night in a Chariot." Having returned to Florence, he painted "The Judgment of Paris," "Aurora and Tithonus," etc. The picture of "The Patronage of the Arts and Sciences by Lorenzo de' Medici" is called his master-piece. Died in 1636.

Mansard or Mansart, mŏn'sär', (FRANÇOIS,) an excellent French architect, born in Paris in 1598. He restored the Hôtel Toulouse, and erected the châteaus of Berny and of Choisy-sur-Seine, and several churches in Paris. The Château de Maisons, a few miles from Paris, is one of his most admired works. His designs are remarkable for nobleness and majesty. He invented the curb-roof called "Mansard." Died in 1666.

See FONTENAY, "Dictionnaire des Artistes."

Mansard or Mansart, (JULES HARDOUIN,) a celebrated architect, born in Paris in 1645, was a son of Jules Hardouin, a painter. His mother was a sister of F. Mansard, noticed above. He studied the art with this uncle, and assumed his name. Having obtained the favour of Louis XIV., he designed the most important architectural works of his reign. He had a rare opportunity to display his genius in the château or royal palace of Versailles, which, though imposing in dimensions and rich in ornaments, fails to satisfy the requirements of good taste. He built the Hôtel des Invalides, —in the grand dome of which he attempted to rival Sir Christopher Wren,—the Château de Marly, the Place Vendôme, and other public works. In 1699 he was chosen superintendent of buildings, arts, and manufactures. Died in 1708.

Man'sęl, (Rev. HENRY LONGUEVILLE,) a prominent English writer on metaphysics and theology, logic, etc., was born at Cosgrove, in Northamptonshire, in 1820. He became professor of moral and metaphysical philosophy at Oxford about 1859, and regius professor of ecclesiastical history in 1867. Among his works is "The Limits of Religious Thought Examined," (1858,) which has attracted much attention and no little criticism and has passed through a number of editions. In this treatise he takes as the basis of his argument Sir William Hamilton's position that "the unconditioned is incognizable and inconceivable;" and the work is justly regarded as one of the most important applications of the Hamiltonian philosophy to questions of religion. He edited Sir W. Hamilton's works on logic and metaphysics. He also contributed to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," a valuable treatise on metaphysics, afterwards published separately. He was appointed Dean of Saint Paul's, London, in 1868. Died July 30, 1871.

Mansfeld, von, fon måns'fĕlt, (ERNST,) COUNT, one of the greatest generals of his time, born in 1585, was the natural son of Peter Ernst, noticed below. After fighting for the King of Spain and the Emperor of Germany, he left their service about 1610, and became an enemy of the house of Austria. He avowed himself a convert to the Reformed faith, and in 1618 was chosen general-in-chief of the Bohemian insurgents. In the service of Frederick, whom those insurgents had elected king, he fought many battles, and defeated the Bavarians in 1622. He afterwards marched into Flanders and repulsed the Spaniards at Fleurus. Having raised another army to attack Austria, he was defeated by Wallenstein in 1626, and died near Zara in the same year. He was one of those generals who are as formidable after defeat as before.

See "Acta Mansfeldica," 1624; NIEMANN, "Geschichte der Grafen von Mansfeld," 1834; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mansfeld, von, (PETER ERNST,) COUNT, an able German general, born in 1517. In his youth he entered the army of the emperor Charles V. After serving in several campaigns, he commanded an army against the French in 1552, and in 1569 led another army to aid Charles IX. against the Huguenots. He distinguished himself at the battle of Moncontour. He succeeded the Duke of Parma as Governor-General of the Low Countries in 1592. Died in 1604.

Mans'field, (EDWARD D.,) LL.D., an American author, born at New Haven, Connecticut, August 17, 1801. He graduated at West Point in 1819, and at Princeton College in 1822. Removing to Cincinnati, he practised law, and for many years was a prominent journalist. He published a "Political Grammar," a "Treatise on Constitutional Law," "Life of General Scott," a "History of the Mexican War," and various educational and legal works. Died October 27, 1880.

Mans'field, (JARED,) an American mathematician, born at New Haven, Connecticut. He became professor of natural philosophy in the Military Academy at West Point. He published several scientific works. Died in 1830.

Mansfield, (JOSEPH KING FENNO,) an American general, born at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1803, graduated at West Point in 1822. He served as captain in the Mexican war, (1846-47,) and became a colonel in 1853. He commanded the department of Washington in June and July, 1861, and directed a corps at the battle of Antietam, where he was killed, September 17, 1862. He was a brigadier-general in the regular army.

Mansfield, LORD. See MURRAY, (WILLIAM.)

Mansfield, (RICHARD,) an actor, born at Heligoland in 1857. He studied art in England, but adopted the theatrical profession, his career being mainly in the United States, and his range of characters reaching from the Mikado to Richard III. He appeared as Cyrano de Bergerac in 1899.

Mansi, mân'see, (GIOVANNI DOMENICO,) a learned Italian prelate, born at Lucca in 1692. He translated into Latin Calmet's "Dictionary of the Bible" and the "Commentary" of the same author, and edited several works of theology. One of the most important of his works was an edition of the "Collection of Councils," ("Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima Collectio," 1757 et seq.,) in which he was aided by N. Coleti. He was appointed Archbishop of Lucca in 1765. Died in 1769.

Manso, mân'so, or Manzo, mân'zo, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) Marquis de Villa, an Italian author, eminent as a patron of literature, was born in Naples about 1560. He expended part of his fortune in founding in Naples the Academy degli Oziosi. He was intimate with the poet Tasso, who commemorated their friendship in his dialogue entitled "Il Manso." Milton, who had been his guest in Naples, addressed to him in complimentary terms a beautiful Latin poem or eclogue entitled "Mansus." Manso wrote the "Life of Torquato Tasso," (1619,) and several poems. Died in 1645.

See TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Manso, mân'so, (JOHANN KASPAR FRIEDRICH,) a German scholar and historian, born in the duchy of Gotha in 1759. He published a "Life of Constantine the Great," (1817,) and a number of poems and antiquarian treatises. Died in 1826.

Man'sŏn, (GEORGE,) a Scottish water-colour painter, born at Edinburgh, December 3, 1850. He worked with success as a designer and wood-engraver, but after 1871 gave his attention entirely to painting. Died at Lympstone, in Devon, February 27, 1876.

Mansoor, (Aboo-Amir-Mohammed.) See AL-MANSOOR.

Mansoor, Mansour, Mançour, or Mansûr, Al, ăl mânsoor', (Aboo-Jaafar- (or Djafar-) Abdallah, ă'boo jă'far ăb-dăl'lah, the second Abbasside caliph of the Arabian empire, succeeded his brother As-Seffâh (or Al-Saffâh) in 754 A.D. About 765 he founded Bagdâd, which thenceforth was the capital of the empire for five centuries. He waged war with success against the Turcomans and the Greeks of Asia Minor, but lost Spain, which was taken possession of by the Omeyyads. He is said to have united superior talents with great cruelty and other vices. He died in 775 A.D., leaving the throne to his son Mahdee, (or Mahdi.)

See WEIL, "Geschichte der Chalifen," vol. ii. chap. ii.

Manstein, von, fon mân'stīn, (CHRISTOPH HERMANN,) an able general and historical writer, born in Saint Petersburg in 1711. In 1745 he entered the service of Prussia, and a few years later became a major-general. He was employed by Frederick the Great in important political affairs, and took part in the battle of Prague, (1757.) He was killed in a skirmish the same year. He left "Historical, Political, and Military Memoirs of Russia," (in French, 2 vols., 1772.) This work has been translated into English.

See HUBER, "Vie de Manstein," prefixed to his "Mémoires."

Mansueti, mân-soo-ā'tee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian painter, born in Venice about 1450; died after 1500.

Mant, (RICHARD,) an English bishop and commentator, born at Southampton in 1776. In conjunction with D'Oyly, he prepared an edition of the Bible, with notes, (1817.) He became Bishop of Down and Connor about 1823. He wrote, besides other works, a "History of the Church in Ireland." Died in 1848.

Mantegazza, (PAOLO,) an Italian physiologist and author, born at Monza in 1831. He studied and practised medicine, became professor of physiology at Pavia in 1860, and of anthropology at Florence in 1870. His works are numerous and varied, embracing such subjects as the physiology of pleasure, pain, and love, spontaneous generation, physiognomy, fiction, and travel.

Mantegna, mân-tĕn'yâ, (ANDREA,) an eminent Italian historical painter and engraver, born at Padua about 1430, was a pupil of F. Squarcione, who adopted him as a son. After he had worked at Padua and Verona, he went to Milan, where he painted the "Triumph of Julius Cæsar," which Vasari esteemed his master-piece, and which was purchased by Charles I. of England. It is now at Hampton Court. He painted several frescos in the Vatican at Rome, and worked some years in Mantua, where he was patronized by the Marquis de Gonzaga. Among his most admired oil-paintings is the "Della Vittoria," (1495,) (a picture of the Marquis of Mantua rendering thanks to the Virgin for his victory at Fornovo,) which still retains its beauty. He was probably the first engraver of his time. Died in 1506.

Mantegna, (FRANCESCO,) an able Italian painter, son of Andrea, noticed above. He was a pupil of his father, and completed several works which the latter left unfinished at Mantua. It is stated that he was the first master of Correggio. Died after 1514.

Mantegna, del, dĕl mân-tĕn'yâ, (CARLO,) an Italian painter, was a relative and pupil of Andrea Mantegna, noticed above. In 1514 he was master of a school of artists in Genoa.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters."

Man'tell, (GIDEON ALGERNON,) an eminent English geologist and palæontologist, born at Lewes, in Sussex, in 1790. He adopted the medical profession, which he practised many years at Lewes. A mine near that place offered him a rich field for observations in geology, to which his attention was early directed. He collected from the Wealden formation and the chalk a museum of specimens of extinct reptiles, fishes, and plants, which was afterwards bought by the trustees of the British Museum for £5000. About 1825 he discovered the Iguanodon, an extinct reptile about sixty feet long, and in that year was elected to the Royal Society. He also discovered three other genera of the colossal Dinosaurian reptiles. In 1822 he published "The Fossils of the South Downs." He removed to Clapham in 1839, and a few years later to London. He not only enriched the science by his discoveries, but was unsurpassed by any English geologist of his time as a lecturer and a popular expounder of geological facts. His most important works are "On the Iguanodon," "The Geology of the Southeast of England," (1838,) "The Wonders of Geology," (1838,) and "The Medals of Creation," (1844.) Died in 1852.

Manteuffel, mân'toif'fĕl, (OTTO THEODOR,) BARON, a Prussian statesman, born at Lübben in 1805. He was appointed director in the ministry of the interior in 1846, and minister of the interior about November, 1848. Many of the notes and diplomatic circulars of 1848 and 1849 were written by him. He was president of the council of ministers from December, 1850, to December, 1858. Died November 26, 1882.

See G. HESEKIEL, "O. T. Manteuffel: ein Preussisches Lebensbild," 1851.

Manteuffel, von, fon mân'toif-fĕl, (EDWIN HANS KARL,) BARON, a German general, born at Magdeburg, February 24, 1809. He entered the Prussian army in 1827. He attained the rank of major-general in 1858, and in 1861 was made adjutant-general and lieutenant-general. He commanded a large force of German troops in the Danish war of 1864, a contest which he is believed to have stirred up intentionally. During the Austrian war of 1866 he was actively and successfully employed in Hanover, Saxony, and Franconia; and in the Franco-German war of 1870–71 he was one of the most brilliant corps-commanders. In 1879 he was named imperial lieutenant (or governor) of Alsace-Lorraine, ranking as field-marshal general and adjutant-general of the German army, and as principal aide-de-camp general of the imperial staff. Died June 17, 1885.

Mantica, mân-tee'kâ, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian prelate and jurist, born at Pordenone in 1534, published "Decisiones Romanæ," (1618.) Died in 1614.

Man'to, [Gr. Μαντώ,] a prophetess, daughter of Tiresias, was taken prisoner by the Argives at Thebes, and was dedicated to Apollo, under whose auspices she is said to have uttered oracles at Delphi. She was sometimes called DAPHNE. She became the wife of Rhakius or Rhacius, and the mother of Mopsus.

Man'ton, (THOMAS,) an English divine, born in Somersetshire in 1620. He obtained the living of Stoke Newington in 1643, and afterwards preached at Covent Garden in London. He was eminent for eloquence and learning, and was appointed chaplain to Cromwell in 1653. In 1660 he became a chaplain to Charles II., but was ejected from his church in London for nonconformity in 1662. Several volumes of his sermons, lectures, etc. were published. Died in 1677.

Mantuan, mân-too-ân', or Mantuano, mân-too-â'no, (BATTISTA,) or Battista Spagnuoli, (spân-yoo-o'lee,) a Latin poet, once of great celebrity, was born at Mantua in 1448. He had great facility as a versifier, but was deficient in taste, and his works, consisting of eclogues, silvæ, etc., are now entirely neglected. "He was, and long continued to be," says Hallam, "the poet of school-rooms. Erasmus says that he would be placed by posterity not much below Virgil." He was, however, surpassed as a Latinist by several of his contemporaries. He lived in an age when Latin composition was in great vogue, especially in Italy. He was a Carmelite friar. Died in 1516.

Mantuano, mân-too-â'no, (ADAMO GHISI,) an able engraver, born at Mantua about 1530, was a son of Giovanni Battista, noticed below. He engraved after Michael Angelo, Giulio Romano, and other masters.

Mantuano, (GIORGIO GHISI,) born at Mantua about 1522, was a skilful engraver and painter. He worked many years in Rome, and engraved the finest works of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and other masters. Among them are "The Last Judgment," after Angelo, and the "Holy Family" and "School of Athens," after Raphael. He was living in 1578.

His sister, DIANA MANTUANA, a skilful artist, engraved several works of Raphael about 1570–80.

Mantuano, [Fr. LE MANTOUAN, lẹh môN'too'ôN',] (GIOVANNI BATTISTA BERTANO,) an Italian painter, sculptor, engraver, and architect, the father of the preceding, was born at Mantua about 1500. He was the head of a family which produced several artists, and whose proper name was GHISI. He was the pupil of Giulio Romano. His engraving of the "Burning of Troy" is highly praised.

Man'u-el I. Com-ne'nus, [Gr. Μανουὴλ ὁ Κομνηνός; Fr. MANUEL COMNÈNE, mȧ'nü'ĕl' kom'nȧn',] a Greek emperor, born about 1120, was a younger son of John Comnenus, who designated him for his successor. Manuel began to reign at Constantinople in 1143. He was ambitious, brave, and licentious. He is accused of perfidy towards the crusaders Conrad of Germany and Louis VII., King of France, who passed, with their armies, through his dominions in 1147, and with whom he had made a treaty of alliance. He afterwards waged war against Roger, King of Sicily, the Hungarians, and the Turks, over whom he gained several victories. Peace was made between him and Roger in 1155. In 1176 he was defeated disastrously by Az-ed-Deen, the Turkish Sultan, near Myriocephalus, where Manuel fought in person. The Turks were defeated in turn by his army in Lydia, in 1177, when the war was ended by treaty. He died in 1180, and was succeeded by his only son, Alexis II.

Manuel II. Palæologus, (pal-e-ol'o-gus,) [Gr. Μανουὴλ ὁ Παλαιολόγος; Fr. MANUEL PALÉOLOGUE, mȧ'nü'ĕl' pȧ'lȧ'o'log',] Emperor of Constantinople, was the second son of John VI., who admitted him as his associate in the empire about 1372. At the death of his father, in 1391, Manuel was held as a hostage by Sultan Bayazeed I. He escaped from Nicæa, and fled to his own capital, in the same year. The enraged Sultan marched against him, and besieged Constantinople. The French and German chivalry came to his assistance with a large army, and forced Bayazeed to raise the siege; but he defeated those allies at Nicopolis (Nicopol) in 1396. The Sultan prosecuted the siege for several years, until the alarming progress of Tamerlane called him away for the defence of his own kingdom. After the defeat and death of Bayazeed, in 1403, Manuel reigned in peace. He died in 1425, aged seventy-seven, and was succeeded by his son, John VII. Palæologus.

Manuel, mȧ-noo-ĕl', or Manoël, mȧ-no-ĕl', (FRANCISCO,) an eminent Portuguese poet, born at Lisbon in 1734. He wrote admired odes, sonnets, and epistles, and attained the reputation of the most excellent modern lyric poet of Portugal. Among his poems is an ode to Washington. The liberality of his principles subjected him to a charge of heresy, for which he was summoned before the Inquisition. He escaped, and retired to Paris in 1788. He made admirable Portuguese versions of La Fontaine's "Fables," Châteaubriand's "Martyrs," and Wieland's "Oberon." His poems were published, under the name of "Filinto Elysio." Died in Paris in 1819.

Manuel, mȧ'nü'ĕl', (JACQUES ANTOINE,) a French orator and republican, born at Barcelonnette (Low Alps) in 1775. In the profession of advocate he attained eminence at Aix. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the Hundred Days, (1815,) when he spoke against the pretensions of Bonaparte and of the Bourbons. In 1818 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies by the liberals, and was ranked among the ablest debaters of that assembly. "Of all the revolutionary orators," says Lamartine, "he was the most feared and hated by the majority." After a speech in reply to Châteaubriand, he was expelled from the Chamber in 1823. Died in 1827. "He had no one to console him," says Lamartine, "but Béranger, whose heart loved in Manuel the antique stamp of the premature but intrepid, moderate, and upright republican. . . . He was more remarkable for character than eloquence; he preferred action to speech," etc.

Manuel, mȧ-noo-ĕl', (Don JUAN,) a Spanish prince and author, was a nephew of Alfonso X. of Castile. He was Regent of Castile during part of the minority of Alfonso XI., and distinguished himself in battle against the Moors. He wrote many works, in prose and verse. His political and moral treatise called "The Count of Lucanor" ("El Conde de Lucanor") was esteemed by Bouterwek as the finest monument of Spanish literature in the fourteenth century. Died about 1350.

Manuel, (LOUIS PIERRE,) a French revolutionist, born at Montargis in 1751. According to Beaulieu, he took a prominent part in the riot of the 10th of August, 1792, and was a partisan of Danton. Soon after this date he conducted the royal captives to the prison of the Temple. He rescued Madame de Staël and Beaumarchais from the massacre of September. As a member of the Convention, he voted against the death of Louis XVI. For this he was proscribed and executed in 1793.

Manuel, mȧ'nü'el', (NICOLAS,) a Swiss artist, author, and Reformer, born at Berne in 1484, was sometimes called DEUTSCH, in Italian TEDESCO, (i.e. the "German.") About 1510 he went to Venice and became a pupil of Titian. He returned to Berne, and painted "The Dance of Death," in fresco. He wrote satirical poems and songs, and "Dramatic Moralities and Mysteries," a humorous composition. In his latter years he held several public offices, and was an active promoter of the Swiss Reformation. Died in 1530.

Manutius, mȧ-nu'shē-us, (AL'DUS,) [It. ALDO MANUZIO, ȧl'do mȧ-noot'se-o; Fr. ALDE MANUCE, ȧld mȧ'nüss',] a celebrated Italian printer and scholar, born at Bassiano, in the Papal States, in 1447. With the patronage of Pico de Mirandola and Alberto Pio, he established a printing-press at Venice about 1490. He invented the form of type called Italic, procured manuscripts from various countries, and published editions of classics which surpassed all others in correctness. About 1500 he formed at Venice a literary association called the Aldine Academy, the design of which was to promote literature by perfecting the copies of the models of antiquity. He compiled a Greek-and-Latin Lexicon, (1497.) Died in 1515.

Manutius, (ALDUS,) or Manuzio, (ALDO,) THE YOUNGER, born at Venice in 1547, was a son of Paolo, noticed below. At the age of fourteen he published a "System of Orthography," ("Orthographiæ Ratio.") He was professor of eloquence at Bologna, Pisa, and Rome. He wrote, besides antiquarian treatises, "The Life of Cosimo I. de' Medici," and "The Accomplished Gentleman," ("Il perfetto Gentil'uomo.") Died in 1597.

See A. RENOUARD, "Annales des Alde."

Manutius, (PAULUS,) or Manuzio, (PAOLO,) an Italian printer, author, and critic, born at Venice in 1512, was a son of Aldus Senior. As the successor of his father in the printing-establishment, he published excellent editions of Latin classics in Venice. About 1562 he removed his press to Rome, whence he returned to Venice in 1570. He acquired a high reputation as a critic and as a writer of elegant Latin. Among his principal works are "On the Roman Senate," ("De Senatu Romano,") "On the Roman State," ("De Civitate Romanâ,") "Roman Antiquities," and a volume of Latin Epistles. "The letters of Manutius," says Hallam, "pall on the reader by their monotonous elegance. . . . Scioppius thinks him consummate in delicacy and grace." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1574.

Man'wood, (JOHN,) an English jurist, flourished about 1600, and wrote a "Treatise on the Laws of the Forest."

Manwood, (Sir ROGER,) probably the father of the preceding, was chief baron of the court of exchequer. Died in 1593.

Manzi, mân'zee, (GULIELMO,) an Italian littérateur, born at Civita Vecchia in 1784. He made a good Italian version of Lucian, (1819,) and wrote a "Discourse on the Spectacles, Festivals, and Luxury of the Italians of the Sixteenth Century," (1818.) Died in 1821.

See TIPALDO, "Biografia degli Italiani illustri;" ROSSI, "Elogio storico di G. Manzi," 1822.

Manzi, (PIETRO,) an Italian writer, born at Civita Vecchia in 1785, was a brother of the preceding. He published "The Conquest of Mexico," (1817,) and other works. Died in 1839.

Manzo. See MANSO.

Manzolli, mân-zol'lee, or Manzoli, mân-zo'lee, (PIETRO or PIER ANGELO,) a Latin poet, born at Stellata, on the Po, in Italy, flourished about 1510–40. He was better known by his assumed name, PALINGENIO or PALINGE'NIUS STELLA'TUS. The events and circumstances of his life are unknown. He wrote a long moral poem, entitled "Zodiac of Life," ("Zodiacus Vitæ," Bâle, 1537,) the books of which are named from the signs of the zodiac. "It is not very poetical," says Hallam, "but by no means without strong passages of sense and spirit, in a lax Horatian metre. The author has said more than enough to incur the suspicion of Lutheranism." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

See GERDES, "Historia Reformationis;" "Palingène," in BAYLE'S "Historical and Critical Dictionary."

Manzoni, mân-zo'nee, (ALESSANDRO,) a celebrated Italian novelist and poet, was born at Milan, March 8, 1784. His father bore the title of count, and his mother was a daughter of the Marquis Beccaria, the eminent jurist and writer. About 1805 he made a long visit to Paris, where he formed an intimate friendship with Fauriel and produced a poem on the death of Carlo Imbonati, (1806.) He married Henriette Louise Blondel, of Geneva, in 1808, and became a zealous member of the Roman Catholic Church. Soon after this event he produced several hymns on the Nativity, the Passion, the Resurrection, etc., which have much literary merit. His next work was a tragedy, called "Il Conte di Carmagnola," (1820,) in which the three unities are not observed. This drama was warmly applauded by Goethe. He published another tragedy, entitled "Adelchi," and an admirable ode on the death of Napoleon, "Il cinque Maggio." His capital work is the historical novel of "I promessi Sposi," (3 vols., 1827,) an English version of which has appeared under the title of "The Betrothed Lovers." It presents a vivid picture of Italian society of the seventeenth century. The style is natural, eloquent, and beautiful. Manzoni became a senator of the kingdom of Sardinia in 1860. Died May 22, 1873.

Manzoni, (FRANCESCA,) an Italian poetess, born in the Milanese in 1710, was versed in the Greek and Latin languages. Died in 1743.

Manzuoli, mân-zoo-o'lee, (TOMMASO,) an able Italian painter, born near Florence in 1536, was also called MASO DA SAN FRIANO. He adorned several churches of Florence. His master-piece is the "Visitation," which is preserved in the gallery of the Vatican. Died in 1575.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.

Mapes, map, ? or Map, (WALTER,) an old English author, born in the Welsh marches about 1150. He became a favourite of Henry II., who sent him on a mission to the King of France and gave him several benefices. In 1196 he was appointed Archdeacon of Oxford. He wrote satirical Leonine Latin poems, among which is an ode which begins "Meum est propositum in taberna mori." In Latin prose he wrote a curious and interesting work called "De Nugis Curialium." He was the reputed author of several romances in French or Anglo-Norman, among them the "Quest du Saint Graal," and certain other Round Table legends, which give him a very high rank in mediæval literature.

Mapleson, (LAURA SCHIRMER,) an American singer, born (Schirmer) at New York in 1862, married Colonel Henry Mapleson in 1891. She first appeared in grand opera in 1879, and within two weeks of her death sang in "The Fencing-Master" at New York. Died January 24, 1894.

Ma'ple-son, (MARIE,) better known by her maiden name of MARIE ROZE, a French singer, born in Paris in 1850. She was educated at the Conservatoire of Paris, and early went upon the operatic stage, where her fine abilities as a singer and her versatility as an actress won her great applause. She married Mr. J. H. Mapleson, a distinguished English manager of the opera.

Mapletoft, mā'pl-toft, (JOHN,) an English physician, born in Huntingdonshire in 1631. He was appointed professor of medicine in Gresham College, London, in 1675. About 1680 he took holy orders. He translated into Latin Sydenham's "Observations," at the request of the author, and wrote "The Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion." Died in 1721.

Mapp, măp, [Lat. MAP'PUS,] (MARC,) a French botanist and physician, born at Strasburg in 1632. He wrote a mediocre "Description of the Plants of Alsace." Died in 1701.

Mappus. See MAPP.

Maquet, mȧ'kȧ', (AUGUSTE,) a French novelist, born in Paris in 1813. He was author in part of "Monte-Cristo," and of other works which were published under the name of Alexandre Dumas. Died January 9, 1888.

Mârâ, mâ'ra, a famous dêva of the Hindoo mythology, mentioned in the history of GAUTAMA, (which see.)

Mara, mâ'râ, originally named Schmelling, (ELIZABETH,) a celebrated German singer, was born at Cassel in 1749. She was a pupil of Paradisi, and became the wife of J. Mara, a violoncellist of Berlin. Between 1784 and 1787 she appeared four times as first vocalist at the Handel Commemoration, and was greatly admired. She afterwards performed with applause in Paris and Berlin. She sang in four languages. Died in 1833.

Mara, de, dẹh mȧ'rȧ', (GUILLAUME,) a priest and Latin poet, born in the diocese of Coutances, France about 1470; died about 1530.

Maracci. See MARRACCI.

Maracci, mâ-rât'chee, or Marracci, mâr-rât'chee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian historical painter, born at Lucca in 1637, was a pupil of Pietro da Cortona. Died in 1704.

Marais, mȧ'rȧ', (MARIN,) a French musical composer, was born in Paris in 1656. Among his works is an opera entitled "Alcyone," (1706.) Died in 1728.

Marais, (MATHIEU,) a French jurist and writer, born in Paris in 1664. He wrote some articles for Bayle's "Historical and Critical Dictionary," and a "Life of La Fontaine," (1811.) Died in 1737.

Marais, des. See REGNIER-DESMARAIS.

Maraldi, mâ-râl'dee, (JACQUES PHILIPPE,) an astronomer, born at Perinaldo, in the county of Nice, in 1665, was a nephew of Giovanni Domenico Cassini, under whom he studied astronomy in Paris. About 1700 he was elected to the French Academy of Sciences. He spent many years in astronomical observations, and in forming a Catalogue of the fixed stars, which he left in manuscript when he died, in 1729.

Maraldi, (JEAN DOMINIQUE,) a nephew of the preceding, was born at Perinaldo in 1709. He became assistant astronomer at the Paris Observatory, and made many observations, which were inserted in the collection of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1788.

Maran, mȧ'rôn', [Lat. MARA'NUS,] (Dom PRUDENT,) a learned French Benedictine monk, born at Sézanne in 1683. He wrote a "Dissertation on the Semi-Arians," and edited the works of Saint Cyprian. Died in 1762.

Marana, mâ-râ'nâ, (GIOVANNI PAOLO or GIAMPAOLO,) an Italian writer, born at Genoa about 1642. He was imprisoned four years (1670–74) for a political reason. About 1682 he removed to Paris, and obtained a pension from the king. In 1684 he published, in French, the first volume of "The Turkish Spy," ("L'Espion Turc,") which was very successful. "The Turkish Spy," says Hallam, "is no ordinary production, but contains as many proofs of a thoughtful, if not very profound, mind, as any we can find. It suggested the Persian Letters to Montesquieu." He published a second volume in 1686. Died in 1693.

Marangoni, mâ-rân-go'nee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian antiquary, born at Vicenza in 1673. He wrote a learned treatise on the Flavian Amphitheatre, and "Thesaurus Parochorum." Died in 1753.

Maransin, mâ'rôN'sàN', (JEAN PIERRE,) BARON, a French general, born at Lourdes in 1770; died in 1828.

Maranta, mâ-rân'tâ, (BARTOLOMMEO,) an Italian botanist and physician, lived at Venosa, in the kingdom of Naples. He assisted Ferrante Imperato in writing his "Natural History," and wrote an esteemed elementary work on botany, entitled "Methodus Cognoscendorum Medicamentorum simplicium," (1559.) "The author," says Hallam, "is independent, though learned, extremely acute in discriminating plants known to the ancients, and has discovered many himself." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died about 1554.

See TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Maranus. See MARAN.

Marat, mâ'râ', (JEAN PAUL,) a leader in the French Revolution, was the son of an Italian named Mara, and was born near Neufchâtel, in Switzerland, in 1743. He practised medicine in Paris before the Revolution with great success, becoming in 1777 a court-physician, but in 1786 he resigned his place. He published many treatises on electricity, optics, etc. In 1789 he aroused the populace by his journal "The Friend of the People," ("L'Ami du Peuple.") He was as a consequence for a long time compelled to live in sewers and cellars to escape the officers of the law. Among the Jacobin leaders he appears to have been the most determined and ferocious enemy alike of the royalists and Girondists, whose insincerity he denounced and for whose half-measures he expressed great contempt. In 1792 he was elected to the Convention, and, uniting with Danton and Robespierre, formed the famous triumvirate of the reign of terror. He became a self-constituted public accuser before the commune and the Convention. In May, 1793, the majority of the Convention ordered his arrest for alleged outrages committed against that assembly. He was tried, but was acquitted by the tribunal and brought back to the Convention in triumph. "The hesitation of Danton," says Lamartine, "and the temporizing of Robespierre, raised Marat at this moment to the apogee of his popularity and power. He shrugged his shoulders at the names of Danton and Robespierre, expressing his doubts of their capacity to guide the Revolution." He was assassinated by Charlotte Corday in his own house in July, 1793. (See CORDAY, CHARLOTTE.) Perhaps no man in all history has been more unanimously condemned than Marat. The perfect agreement in regard to his character among his contemporaries of the most diverse and even opposite opinions on other subjects, furnishes the strongest probability that that condemnation was entirely just. That he preferred the gratification of his malignant passions to the pursuit of wealth or of ordinary pleasures is no proof of any very exalted disinterestedness. History furnishes many examples of men who, dominated by one supreme passion, have been indifferent to every other consideration. We find very little force or reason in the recent attempts to rehabilitate the reputation of Marat. The only charitable view of his character that can rationally be maintained is to suppose that his mind, more especially his moral nature, was deeply diseased. For the credit of humanity, we may hope that he was not fully responsible for his conduct.

Maratta, mâ-rât'tâ, or Maratti, mâ-rât'tee, (CARLO,) an Italian painter, born at Camurano, in the March of Ancona, in May, 1625, enjoyed in his time the reputation of being one of the best painters in Europe. He became a pupil of Andrea Sacchi and a devout student of Raphael's works, and chose Rome as his permanent residence. He was employed by Clement IX. and by four other successive popes, and received the title of painter-ordinary to Louis XIV., for whom he painted a picture of Daphne. His Madonnas are admired for modest dignity and amiable expression. He preferred to paint pictures for galleries and altars, rather than large works. Maratta also excelled in the art of etching. He was the last great painter of the Roman school. Died in 1713.

See BELLORI, "Vita del Cavalier Maratti," 1732.

Maratta or Maratti, (MARIA,) a daughter of the preceding, was a painter and a poetess. She was married to G. Zappé, the poet.

Marbach, mar'bâK, (JOHANN,) a German Protestant theologian, born at Lindau in 1521. Among his works is "The Faith of Jesus and of the Jesuits," ("Fides Jesus et Jesuitarum.") Died in 1581.

Marbeau, mâR'bō', (JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS,) a French writer on social economy, born at Brives in 1798. He founded in 1844 charitable institutions called Crèches, for infants whose mothers serve as labourers out of their own houses. Died October 10, 1875.

Mar'beck, (JOHN,) an English composer of cathedral music, was organist of Windsor in the reign of Henry VIII. He composed the notes to the Preces and Responses used in the English cathedrals. Having identified himself with the Protestant cause, he was condemned to be burned for heresy about 1545, but was pardoned,—perhaps on account of his musical skill. He published a "Book of Common Prayer Noted," (1550,) and a "Concordance." Died in 1585.

Marbeuf or Marbœuf, mâR'bùf', (LOUIS CHARLES RENÉ,) MARQUIS, a French general, born near Rennes in 1712. He commanded in Corsica against Paoli, by whom he was defeated in 1768. Died in 1786.

Marbois, mâR'bwâ', (FRANÇOIS de Barbé—dẹh bâR'bâ',) MARQUIS, called also MARQUIS DE MARBOIS, a French statesman and writer, born at Metz in 1745. About 1780 he was chargé-d'affaires and consul-general to the United States. In 1792 Louis XVI., who esteemed him for his probity, sent him on an embassy to Vienna. He was elected in 1795 to the Council of Elders, in which he spoke often and with ability. In September, 1797, he was, with others, deported to Guiana by the Directory. Bonaparte appointed him director of the treasury, or minister of finance, in 1801. Marbois was dismissed in 1805, but in 1808 became first president of the Cour des Comptes, (Chamber of Accounts, or exchequer.) He held this office about thirty years. He was keeper of the seals and minister of justice in 1815 and 1816, and received the title of marquis in 1817. He wrote numerous moral, political, and historical works, among which are "The Conspiracy of Arnold against the United States," (1816,) and a "History of Louisiana," (1828.) Died in 1837.

Marbot, mâR'bo', (ANTOINE ADOLPHE MARCELLIN,) a French general, born at Altillac in 1781; died in 1844.

Marbot, (JEAN BAPTISTE ANTOINE,) a general, born at Altillac in 1782, was a brother of the preceding. Napoleon left him a legacy of one hundred thousand francs. Died in 1854.

Marc, the French for MARK, which see.

Marc, mârk, (CHARLES CHRÉTIEN HENRI,) a physician, born at Amsterdam in 1771, settled in Paris in 1798. About 1818 he became physician to the Duke of Orléans, who, on his accession as Louis Philippe, in 1830, gave him the title of first physician to the king. He wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on Insanity," ("De la Folie," etc., 2 vols., 1840,) and published several able medical treatises. Died in 1841.

Marceau, mär'sō', (FRANÇOIS SÉVERIN DESGRAVIERS,) a French general, born at Chartres in 1769. He entered the army in 1786, and became a general of brigade at the age of twenty-two. In 1793 he obtained the chief command of the army sent against the Vendeans, whom he defeated at Mans. In 1795 and 1796 he commanded a division on the Rhine and in the Palatinate, where he gained advantages over the Austrians. He was killed in battle near Altenkirchen in 1796. Kléber, who was his friend, said, "I have never known any general so capable as Marceau to change the plan of battle on the spot with sang-froid and judgment."

Marcel. See MARCELLUS I., Bishop of Rome.

Marcel, mär'sĕl', (ÉTIENNE,) a French partisan chief and agitator of reform, was provost of the merchants of Paris when King John was defeated and made prisoner at Poitiers, in 1356. He became the leader of the popular party in its contest with the dauphin Charles, who acted as regent. Marcel was predominant in Paris, and controlled a majority in the States-General, which refused to vote supplies for the war unless their grievances should be redressed. A revolution was effected which rendered the government almost republican. Having given the command of Paris to Charles the Bad, of Navarre, he was betrayed by him, and was assassinated in 1358.

See NAUDET, "Conjuration d'Étienne Marcel," etc.; FROISSART, "Chronique;" SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français."

Marcel, (GUILLAUME,) a French chronologist, born at Toulouse in 1647. He negotiated a treaty with the Dey of Algiers in 1677. He published valuable "Chronological Tablets," and a "History of the Origin and Progress of the French Monarchy," (1686,) which is commended for accuracy in dates. Died in 1708.

Marcel, (GUILLAUME,) a French writer and priest, born about 1612. He wrote Latin and French verse, etc. Died in 1702.

Marcel, (JEAN JOSEPH,) an eminent French Orientalist and historian, born in Paris in November, 1776. He went to Egypt in 1798 as a member of the scientific commission, and, having returned to France in 1801, was selected as one of the rédacteurs of the "Description of Egypt." He was director of the national printing department (imprimerie) from 1802 to 1814. Among his numerous works are "Mélanges Orientaux," (1833,) a "History of Egypt from the Arabian Conquest to the French Expedition," (2d edition, 1844,) and a "Scientific and Military History of the French Expedition in Egypt," (with Louis Reybaud,) (10 vols., 1830–36.) Died in 1854.

See BELIN, "Notice sur J. J. Marcel," in the "Journal Asiatique," 1854; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Marcel, mart'sel, (N.,) a German painter of flowers, fruits, etc., born at Frankfort in 1628; died in 1683.

Mar-cel'la, a Roman lady, was a daughter of C. Marcellus and Octavia, who was a sister of the emperor Augustus. She was married first to M. V. Agrippa, divorced in 21 B.C., and married again to a son of Mark Antony the triumvir.

Marcellin. See MARCELLINUS.

Mar-cel-li'nus, [Fr. MARCELLIN, mär'sà'lăN',] SAINT, a native of Rome, succeeded Caius as Bishop of Rome, or pope, in 295 A.D. During his tenure of that office the Church was persecuted by Diocletian. He died in 304 or 305, and was succeeded by Marcellus I.

Marcellis, mar-sel'lis, (OTHO,) a Dutch painter of flowers and animals, was born in 1613. He worked with success in Paris, Rome, and Amsterdam. Died in 1673.

Marcello, mar-chel'lo, (BENEDETTO,) a celebrated Italian composer and poet, born of a patrician family at Venice in 1686, was a pupil of Gasparini. He studied law, and was for fourteen years a member of the Council of Forty. He gained distinction as a poet by a number of sonnets and canzoni. His capital work is a collection of psalms, entitled "Estro poetico-armonico Parafrasi sopra i 50 primi Salmi," (1724.) These were received with universal enthusiasm throughout Europe, and merited for the author the appellation of the Pindar and Michael Angelo of musicians. Died in 1739.

Marcello, (PIETRO,) an Italian biographer, lived at Venice about 1500, and wrote "De Vita Principum et Gestis Venetorum," (1554.)

Mar-cel'lus [Fr. MARCEL, mär'sĕl'; It. MARCELLO, mar-chel'lo] I., Bishop of Rome, was a Roman by birth, and was elected in 308 A.D. His efforts to maintain strict discipline are said to have caused a schism and sedition among the believers. He died in 309 or 310, and was succeeded by Eusebius.

Marcellus II., POPE, born at Fano in 1501, was named MARCELLUS CERVIUS. He was elected pope in April, 1555, after the death of Julius III. About three weeks after his election he died, and was succeeded by Paul IV.

See A. BOWER, "History of the Popes;" ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire des souverains Pontifes Romains."

Mar-cel'lus, (CAIUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman consul, who married Octavia, the sister of Octavius Cæsar. He became consul in 50 B.C., before which he had attached himself to the party of Pompey. While in this office he made a motion in the senate to deprive Cæsar of his command, but did not succeed. He remained in Italy during the civil war, and shared the clemency of Cæsar after the victory of the latter. Died about 40 B.C.

Mar-cel'lus, [It. MARCELLO, mar-chel'lo,] (DONATO,) an Italian physician, born at Mantua. He wrote "De Historia Medica mirabili," (1586.)

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman general, celebrated as the conqueror of Syracuse, born about 266 B.C., was the greatest member of a consular plebeian family which produced several eminent men. In 222 he became consul, (with Cn. Cornelius Scipio,) defeated the Insubrians on the Po, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After Hannibal had invaded Italy in the second Punic war, Marcellus was chosen prætor for the year 216 B.C., in which the battle of Cannæ was fought. He was not present at this battle. The command of the forces which escaped from that defeat having devolved on him, he repulsed the attack of Hannibal on Nola, and was the first that checked his victorious progress. He was elected for the third time consul for the year 214, with the great Fabius Maximus as his colleague. His most famous exploit was the conquest of Syracuse, which, though defended by the genius of Archimedes, he took, after a siege of two years and some months, in 212 B.C. He again obtained the consulship in 210 B.C., with the command of the army in Italy, and fought an indecisive battle with Hannibal at Numistro. Marcellus and Hannibal commanded the respective armies at Canusium, (209,) where the Romans claimed the victory. Marcellus was elected consul for the fifth time in 208 B.C. Having advanced to reconnoitre near Venusia, he fell into an ambuscade, and was killed in the skirmish with the advanced posts of Hannibal, in that year. Plutarch has drawn a parallel between Marcellus and Pelopidas, "who," he says, "were both men of heroic strength, and were equal in courage and magnanimity." Polybius denies that Marcellus ever defeated Hannibal.

See PLUTARCH'S "Lives;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus;" LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii.–xxvii.; POLYBIUS, "History;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman general, was a son of the preceding. He was wounded in the skirmish in which his father was killed. He was elected prætor in 198 B.C., and consul in 196, when he commanded in Cisalpine Gaul and defeated the Insubrians. In 189 he was censor. Died in 177 B.C.

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a son of the preceding, obtained the consulship in 166 B.C. He was chosen consul again in 155, and gained a victory over the Ligurians. In 152 he obtained a third consulship, with command of the army in Spain, where he subdued the Celtiberians and founded Corduba, (Córdova.) He perished by shipwreck in 148 B.C.

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) the friend of Cicero, and the subject of the admirable oration "Pro M. Marcello," was a descendant of the great Marcellus. He had a high reputation as an orator. Elected consul in 52 B.C., he urged the senate to extreme measures against Cæsar. In the civil war he was an adherent of Pompey and the senate. He fled from Rome in 49, and joined the army in Epirus. After the ruin of his cause at Pharsalia, he exiled himself to Mitylene. Overcome by the warm intercession of the senators, Cæsar granted him a pardon in 47 B.C. On this occasion Cicero expressed his thanks to the dictator, and his high estimate of the merit of Marcellus, in the oration which bears his name. Marcellus was on his homeward journey when he was assassinated, near Athens, by P. Magius, one of his attendants, about 46 B.C.

See CICERO, "Pro M. Marcello;" DRUMANN, "Geschichte Roms;" ORELLI, "Onomasticon Tullianum."

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) was the son of C. Claudius Marcellus, noticed above, and Octavia. About the year 25 B.C. he was adopted by his uncle, the emperor Augustus, who gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. He was a youth of promising talents, and was a general favourite. He died in his twentieth year, in the autumn of 23 B.C. His memory was embalmed by Virgil in a beautiful passage of his epic poem, (book vi., v. 872, etc.,) which was recited by the poet in the presence of Octavia and Augustus. (See OCTAVIA.)

See PLUTARCH, "Marcellus;" TACITUS, "Annales."

Mar-cel'lus Em-pĭr'ĭ-cus, a Latin writer, born at Burdigala, (Bordeaux.) He was magister officiorum in the reign of Theodosius the Great, (379–395 A.D.) He was author of a pharmaceutical work, "De Medicamentis Empiricis, Physicis," etc.

Mar-cel'lus Si-de'tēs, a native of Side, in Pamphylia, lived about 140 A.D. He wrote a long Greek medical poem, of which fragments are extant.

Mar-cel'lus Ul'pĭ-us, a Roman jurist, who flourished about 150 A.D., and was a legal adviser of the emperor Antoninus Pius. He was author of thirty-one books of "Digesta," six books on the "Leges Julia et Papia," and one book of "Responsa." About one hundred and fifty excerpts from his works are found in the "Digest." He is often quoted as high authority by Ulpian, Paulus, and other jurists.

He published notes on Persius, Horace, Lucian, and other classics, and wrote "Lusus de Nemine," (1586,) a poem, and a "History of New-Year's Gifts," ("Historia Strenarum," 1599.) Died in 1617.

Marcion, mar'she-on, [Gr. Μαρκίων,] a celebrated heresiarch of the second century, was born at Sinope, in Pontus. Having been excommunicated for some youthful fault, he went to Rome about 140 A.D. He devised a new creed or system, which was accepted by numerous disciples (Marcionites) and was opposed by Tertullian, Origen, and other Fathers. He taught the existence of two original principles,—the authors of good and evil,— and ascribed the Mosaic law to the evil principle. He also rejected a large part of the New Testament.

See TILLEMONT, "Mémoires ecclésiasliques;" LARDNER, "History of Heretics;" SCHELLING, "Dissertatio de Marcione," 1795.

Marck, de la, deh lă mark, (GUILLAUME,) a Flemish chief, born in 1446, was noted for his ferocity, and was surnamed THE WILD BOAR OF ARDENNES. He assassinated the Bishop of Liege, and ravaged Brabant, but was defeated by the archduke Maximilian. He then made an alliance with René of Lorraine in order to renew the war. Maximilian captured him, and put him to death in 1485. William de la Marck is a conspicuous character in Scott's romance of "Quentin Durward."

Marck, de la, (ROBERT,) COUNT, was master of the duchy of Bouillon and of Sedan. He was an ally of France in the war against the Austrians. He was driven out of his dominions by the armies of Charles V., but was restored by the treaty of Madrid, (1526.) Died in 1535. His son Robert became marshal of France. (See FLEURANGES.)

Marcus Aurelius. See AURELIUS ANTONINUS.

Mar'cus Græ'cus (gree'kus) passes for the author of a Latin work on the art of destroying enemies by fire, ("Liber Ignium ad Comburendos Hostes,") a manuscript of which is said to be found in the Royal Library of Paris. No ancient writer mentions him, and nothing is known of his history. G. Fournier (of the "Biographie Universelle") conjectures that he wrote near the close of the thirteenth century, and thinks the "Liber Ignium" is a rather bad version of a Greek original. "It is a tissue of errors," he adds, "and a collection of recipes, one or two of which give almost exactly the composition of gunpowder."

Mar'cy, (OLIVER,) LL.D., an American instructor, born in Coleraine, Massachusetts, February 13, 1820. He graduated at Wesleyan University in 1846. In 1862 he became professor of natural history in the University at Evanston, Illinois, and acted as its president from 1876 to 1881. He was for some time a geologist in the United States territorial surveys.

Mar'cy, (RANDOLPH B.,) an American general, born in Massachusetts about 1812, graduated at West Point in 1832. He became a captain in 1846, and colonel in 1861. He served as chief of staff of the army of the Potomac in 1862, under General McClellan, was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1865, and became inspector-general in 1878. Died November 22, 1887.

Marcy, (WILLIAM L.,) a distinguished American statesman of the Democratic party, born at Southbridge, Massachusetts, in 1786. Having graduated at Brown University in 1808, he studied law at Troy, New York. He entered the army as lieutenant on the breaking out of the war of 1812, and distinguished himself in several engagements in Canada. About 1820 he became editor of the "Troy Budget," a Democratic journal, and in 1823 was elected comptroller of the State. He became a United States Senator in 1831, and was chosen Governor of New York in 1832, 1834, and 1836. He was a candidate in 1838, but was defeated by Mr. Seward. He was appointed by President Polk secretary of war in March, 1845, and displayed much ability in this position, which was rendered more arduous by the occurrence of the Mexican war. He retired from office in March, 1849, after which he passed four years in private life. He supported General Cass in the Presidential election of 1848, and was secretary of state in the cabinet of President Pierce from March 4, 1853, to March 4, 1857. During this period he gained a high reputation as a diplomatist. He died at Ballston Spa on the 4th of July, 1857.

Mar-dō'nĭ-us, [Gr. Μαρδόνιος,] an able Persian general, was a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspes. In 492 B.C. he commanded a large armament sent by Darius against the Grecian states. Having lost a great part of his fleet in a storm, he returned without success. In 481 he held a high command in the expedition which Xerxes led against the Greeks. After the Persians had been defeated at Salamis, (480 B.C.,) Xerxes returned home, leaving 300,000 men under Mardonius, who captured Athens without much resistance. He was defeated and killed at Platæa in 479 B.C. by the army of Pausanias.

Marduk, a great deity of the old Babylonians, identified by the Greeks with Zeus, but in many respects resembling Mercury. The planet Mercury was also called Marduk.

Marestier, mȧ′rĕs′tē-ā′, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) an able French engineer and naval architect, born at Saint-Servan about 1780. He constructed the first steamboat used by the military marine for the service of seaports. He published a "Treatise on the Steamboats of the United States," etc., (1824.) Died in 1832.

Maret, mȧ′rȧ′, (HUGUES,) a learned French physician and writer, born at Dijon in 1726. He was a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, and a friend of the celebrated chemist Guyton de Morveau. One of his sons was the Duke of Bassano, noticed below. Died in 1786.

Maret, (HUGUES BERNARD,) Duke of Bassano, an able French statesman and diplomatist, born at Dijon in 1763. He studied law in Paris, and in 1789 reported the debates of the National Assembly in a daily "Bulletin." This was soon united with the "Moniteur," which owed its success to the reports of Maret. Under the new régime he was rapidly advanced in the department of foreign affairs, and was sent on missions to England and Naples in 1793. On his way to Naples he was arrested by the Austrians, and confined in a dungeon about two years. From 1800 to 1811, as secretary-general, or secretary of state, he directed the home department with great credit, had a large share of Bonaparte's confidence, and accompanied him in his campaigns. In 1811 he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and received the title of Duke of Bassano. On the return of Bonaparte from Elba, Maret became again his secretary. He was restored to the rank of a peer of France in 1831, and in 1834 was minister of the interior for a short time. He had been admitted into the Institute (Académie Française) in 1803. Died in 1839.

He studied medicine, experimented in physiology, was made professor of natural history in the College of France in 1860, and was elected to the Academy of Sciences in 1878. He invented many instruments for physiological research and for studying the flight of birds and insects, and recorded his results in several published volumes.

Marezoll, mȧ′rĕt-sol′, (GUSTAV LUDWIG THEODOR,) a German jurist, born at Göttingen in 1794. He was the author of several legal works. Died in 1873.

Mar'ga-ret OF ANJOU, [Fr. MARGUERITE D'ANJOU, mȧR′gRĕt′ dŏN′zhoo′,] a daughter of René of Anjou, Duke of Lorraine, was born in Lorraine in 1429. She was married in 1445 to Henry VI., King of England, and, in consequence of his imbecility, had the principal share in the government. In the ensuing contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, her troops were several times victorious over the former; but they suffered a fatal defeat at Towton in 1461. After several unsuccessful efforts to repair her fortunes, Margaret was again defeated and made a prisoner at Tewksbury by Edward IV. in 1471. She was ransomed by the French king, Louis XI., and passed the remainder of her life in France, where she died in 1481.

Margaret OF AUSTRIA, [Ger. MARGARETHE VON OESTREICH, mar-gä-rä′tĕh fon öst′rĪK,] daughter of Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, and Mary of Burgundy, was born at Ghent in 1480. She was betrothed when a child to Charles VIII. of France. But he refused to keep the engagement, and married in 1491 Anne, the heiress of Brittany. Margaret was married in 1497 to Don Juan, Infant of Spain, son of Ferdinand and Isabella, who survived but a few months. She was again married in 1501 to Philibert the Handsome, Duke of Savoy, who died in 1505. In 1517 Margaret was appointed by her father ruler of the Netherlands, in which post she displayed signal ability. She had a part in the League of Cambray, formed in 1508 by the principal European powers against Venice. She died in 1530, leaving a number of works in prose and verse, including her "Correspondence," which was published in 1839, (2 vols.)

Margaret OF AUSTRIA, Duchess of Parma, born at Brussels in 1522, was a natural daughter of Charles V., Emperor of Germany. She was married in 1533 to Alessandro de' Medici, Duke of Florence, and after his death to Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma. In 1599 she was appointed Governor of the Netherlands by Philip II. of Spain. This difficult post she occupied till 1567, when she resigned it to the Duke of Alva. The celebrated Alexander Farnese, afterwards Duke of Parma, was her son and only child.

Margaret, [Danish, MARGARETHE, mar-gä-rä′tĕh,] daughter of Waldemar III., King of Denmark, born at Copenhagen in 1353, was married in 1363 to Haquin, King of Norway. In 1376 she was appointed Regent of Denmark during the minority of her son Olaus, then but five years old. On the death of Haquin, in 1380, she became Queen of Norway, and, her son dying in 1387, the Danes also acknowledged her as their sovereign. Soon after this, Margaret engaged in a war with Albert, King of Sweden, against whom his subjects had rebelled. Her army defeated the Swedes and captured Albert, (1388,) who obtained his liberty only by renouncing the crown of Sweden. At an assembly of the estates of the three kingdoms, held at Calmar in 1397, the famous treaty called "the Calmar Union" was formed. By this it was agreed that Sweden, Denmark, and Norway should in future be united under one sovereign, and Eric VII., nephew of Margaret, was appointed her successor. Died in 1411.

Margaret OF FRANCE, or OF VALOIS, [Fr. MARGUERITE DE VALOIS, mȧR′gRĕt′ dĕh vȧ′lwȧ′,] a daughter of Henry II. and Catherine de Médicis, was born in 1553. She had respectable talents, but little virtue. In 1572 she was married to Henry of Navarre; but love apparently had no part in this fatal alliance. During the festivities that followed the marriage, the perfidious court of Charles IX. ordered the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew. She had lived separately from her husband some years before he became Henry IV. of France and their union was formally dissolved about the year 1600. Died in 1615.

Margaret, Queen of Navarre, originally Margaret of Angoulême, [Fr. MARGUERITE D'ANGOULÊME, mȧR′gRĕt′ dŏN′goo′lĕm′,] daughter of Charles, Count of Angoulême, and Louise of Savoy, and sister of Francis I., was born in 1492. She was married in 1509 to Charles, Duke of Alençon, who died in 1525, and in 1527 she became the wife of Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre. She was distinguished for her beauty, talents, and superior culture, and exercised great influence in the government of her brother, Francis I., to whom she was warmly attached. The mildness and toleration she displayed towards the Protestants, and particularly her protection of Calvin, brought upon her the imputation of heresy from the Catholic party. She was the author of numerous works in prose and verse, among which may be named the "Heptameron," a collection of tales in the style of Boccaccio's "Decamerone," and a devotional treatise entitled "Mirror of the Sinful Soul." She died in 1549, leaving a daughter, Jeanne d'Albret, afterwards the mother of Henry IV. of France.

Maria, mȧ·ree′ȧ, II., (DA GLORIA, dȧ glo′re·ȧ,) daughter of Don Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, and Leopoldine, Archduchess of Austria, was born at Rio Janeiro in 1819. Her father succeeded to the throne of Portugal in March, 1826, but renounced his right in favour of Dona Maria. Her uncle Don Miguel usurped the throne about May, 1828, and was supported by the absolutist party. A civil war ensued, Don Miguel was defeated, and Dona Maria became queen about September, 1833. She married Duke Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg-Kohary in April, 1836. Her reign was disturbed by émeutes and insurrections. She died in November, 1853, and was succeeded by her son, Pedro V.

Maria Louisa, mą·rī′ą loo·ee′zą, [Fr. MARIE LOUISE, mȧ′re′ loo′ēz′,] daughter of the emperor Francis I. of Austria and Maria Theresa of Naples, was born a Vienna in 1791. She was married in 1810 to Napoleon I., Emperor of France, to whom she bore a son in March, 1811. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, she retired to Vienna, and in 1816 the allied powers gave her the duchy of Parma. She was privately married to Count Neipperg, her chamberlain. Died in 1847.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Maria Louisa Augusta, (CATHERINE,) Empress of Germany, was a daughter of Charles Frederick, Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar, and grand-daughter of Paul I., Czar of Russia. She was born September 30, 1811, and in her youth was associated with Goethe at Weimar. In 1829 she married William, the future king of Prussia, and the first emperor of Germany in the new régime. The empress Augusta was noted for benevolence, and for her love of art and letters. Died January 7, 1890.

Maria Theresa, mȧ-ree′ȧ tȧ-rā′sȧ, [Fr. MARIE THÉRÈSE, mȧ′re′ tȧ′rȧz′,] daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, was married in 1660 to Louis XIV. of France. (See LOUIS XIV.)

Maria Theresa, mȧ-rī′ȧ te-ree′sȧ, [Fr. MARIE THÉRÈSE, mȧ′re′ tȧ′rȧz′; It. MARIA TERESIA, mȧ-ree′ȧ tȧ-rā′se-ȧ,] daughter of Charles VI., Emperor of Germany, and Elizabeth Christina of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, was born in May, 1717. She was married in 1736 to Francis, Duke of Lorraine. Charles VI., who died in 1740, appointed her heir to his hereditary thrones, in accordance with the act called the Pragmatic Sanction, but her claims were disputed by the Electors of Saxony and Bavaria and by the Kings of Prussia, Spain, and Sardinia, each of whom claimed some portion in the name of the Austrian princesses with whom they were connected. Maria Theresa immediately repaired to Vienna, where she received the homage of the Austrian states, and thence proceeding to Presburg was crowned Queen of Hungary in 1741. She received offers of assistance from Frederick II. of Prussia on condition of her ceding to him Lower Silesia, but she firmly refused. Her capital being soon after threatened with a siege by the Elector of Bavaria and his French allies, the queen convoked the Hungarian Diet at Presburg, where, with her infant children, she said to the deputies that, "being assailed by enemies on every side, she had no hopes except in their loyalty, and she had come to place under their protection the daughter and son of their kings." The Hungarian nobles responded with enthusiasm to this appeal, and drew their swords, exclaiming, "We will die for our king, Maria Theresa!" ("Moriamur pro rege nostro, Maria Theresia!") The French and Bavarians were soon driven out of her hereditary states by the forces under General Kevenhuller and Prince Charles of Lorraine. In 1742 a treaty of peace was concluded between Maria Theresa and the King of Prussia, by which the latter obtained Silesia. The Elector of Bavaria, who had been previously chosen Emperor of Germany under the name of Charles VII., having died in 1745, Francis, the husband of Maria Theresa, was elected to that dignity. In 1746 the Imperialists gained important victories in Italy, and defeated the French and Spaniards at Piacenza. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, put an end to the war of the Austrian succession, leaving the empress in possession of all her hereditary estates except Silesia. The Seven Years' war, carried on by Prussia against France, Russia, and Austria, terminated in 1763, leaving the boundaries of Austria and Prussia the same as before. The emperor Francis having died in 1765, his son Joseph was elected Emperor of Germany; but Maria Theresa still retained the principal share in the government of her hereditary dominions. She is said to have refused to take any part in the partition of Poland (1772) until prevailed upon by the representations of Joseph II. and Prince Kaunitz. Among the important reforms of her reign was the abolition of the torture (1776) and of feudal service. She also abolished the Inquisition at Milan, and suppressed the order of Jesuits. She died in November, 1780, and was succeeded by her son, Joseph II., as King of Hungary.

Ma-rĭ-am′ne, [Gr. Μαριάμνη,] a beautiful Jewess, a granddaughter of the high-priest Hyrcanus II., became in 38 B.C. the wife of Herod the Great, who, when he departed from his capital to meet Octavian, gave secret orders that she should be put to death in case he did not return in safety. This secret having been revealed to her, she received him coldly on his return, and excited his jealousy, which was increased by the intrigues of Herod's sister Salome, who suborned the royal cupbearer to testify that Mariamne designed to poison the king. She was put to death in 29 B.C. This story is the subject of one of Voltaire's tragedies.

Mariana, de, dȧ mȧ-re-ȧ′nȧ, (JUAN,) an eminent Spanish historian, born at Talavera in 1536. He studied at Alcalá, and, having entered the order of Jesuits, was appointed professor of theology in their college at Rome, (1560.) He returned to Spain in 1574, where he passed the remainder of his life in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits. He published in 1599 his "Treatise on Royalty," ("De Rege et Regis Institutione,") in which he maintains that it is lawful in certain cases to put a king to death. This work caused a great sensation, particularly in France, where it was denounced by the Sorbonne, and soon after the assassination of Henry IV. it was publicly burned by order of the Parliament. In 1592 he brought out his great work entitled "Historia de Rebus Hispaniæ," ("History of Spain,") which was received with great favour and was soon after translated by him into Spanish. His Latin style is characterized by great elegance and animation, and has been compared to that of Livy; while his Spanish history is generally esteemed the most admirable work of the kind in the language. "Noble, pure, and rich without diffuseness, it unites with rare felicity," says a French critic, "the picturesque vivacity of the chroniclers with the dignity of history;" and Ticknor, in his "History of Spanish Literature," observes, "Its admirably idiomatic style, so full yet so unencumbered, so pure and yet so rich, renders it, if not the most trustworthy of annals, at least the most remarkable union of picturesque chronicling with sober history that the world has ever seen." Mariana also published a treatise "On Weights and Measures," "On Death and Immortality," and other learned works, in Latin, and an essay entitled "De las Enfermedades de la Compañia y de sus Remedios," ("On the Disorders of the Society [of Jesuits] and their Remedies," 1625,) in which he boldly exposes and condemns the errors of the Jesuits. Died in 1623.

Marie Amélie de Bourbon, mȧ're' ȧ'mȧ'le' dĕh boor'bŏN', Queen of France, born near Naples in 1782, was a daughter of Ferdinand I., King of the Two Sicilies. She was married in 1809 to the Duke of Orléans, afterwards King Louis Philippe. After his death she retired to England, where she resided at Claremont, near London. Died in 1866.

Marie Anne Christine Victoire de Bavière mȧ're' ȧn krĕs'tēn' vĕk'twȧr' dĕh bȧ've-air', daughter of Ferdinand, Elector of Bavaria, was born at Munich in 1660. In 1680 she was married to Louis, the Dauphin of France, son of Louis XIV. She died in 1690, leaving three sons.

Marie Antoinette Josèphe Jeanne d'Autriche, mȧ're' ŏN'twȧ'nĕt' zho'zȧf' zhȧn dō'trĕsh', (commonly called simply Marie Antoinette,) born at Vienna in 1755, was the daughter of Maria Theresa and the emperor Francis I. of Germany. She was married in 1770 to the Dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. High-spirited and energetic, she strove during the revolutionary troubles to inspire the king with her own courage; but her counsels often led him into greater difficulties. It was her misfortune and the misfortune of France that she resisted all those reforms which might have prevented or moderated the violence of the Revolution. Possessing extraordinary personal charms and great vivacity of disposition, the freedom of her manners was often misconstrued by her enemies; but their accusations are generally believed to have been groundless. During the terrible scenes which followed the captivity of the royal family, she displayed the greatest firmness and dignity, showing on all occasions more concern for her husband and children than for herself. After the fall of the Girondists, Marie Antoinette was condemned to death by the Jacobins, and executed in October, 1793. (See LOUIS XVI.)

Marie de Médicis, mȧ're' dĕh mȧ'de'sēss', or Maria de' Medici, mȧ-ree'ȧ dȧ mĕd'e-chee, the daughter of Francis, Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the archduchess Joan of Austria, was born at Florence in 1573. She was married in 1600 to Henry IV, of France. She had moderate abilities, but exorbitant ambition; and her obstinacy and violent temper were the source of constant dissension between her and her husband. On the death of Henry she became regent, for which office she proved herself utterly incompetent. Having given offence to her subjects by her partiality for unworthy favourites, she was deposed and imprisoned, but, effecting her escape, again took part in the government. She introduced Richelieu into the administration, who soon possessed himself of the highest power, and induced her son, Louis XIII., to imprison her (1630) at Compiègne. After a second escape, she died at Cologne in 1642.

Having early manifested a love for the arts, she studied sculpture and design under Ary Scheffer. Among her works the statue of Joan of Arc is the most generally admired. She was married in 1837 to Duke Alexander of Würtemberg. Died in 1839.

Marie Thérèse. See MARIA THERESA.

Mariette, mȧ're'ĕt', (AUGUSTE ÉDOUARD,) a celebrated French archæologist, born at Boulogne in 1821. Having acquired a knowledge of Egyptian hieroglyphics he was charged in 1850 with a scientific mission to Egypt, where he discovered the site of the city of Memphis and disinterred the temple of Serapis and a necropolis of vast extent. In this were found the granite sarcophagi of the bulls of Apis, hewn out of a single stone, fifteen feet long, nine in width, and the same in height. He also removed the sand from the colossal Sphinx, which was cut entire from a rock. He published "The Serapeum at Memphis," illustrated, (1857–66.) "Researches in Egypt, Nubia, and the Soudan," (1867.) "The Egyptian Papyruses in the Museum at Boulac," (2 vols., 1871–73.) "Deir-el-Bahari: Topographical, Historical, and Ethnographical Documents gleaned in that Temple," (1877.) He died January 19, 1881.

Mariette, (PIERRE JEAN,) a French painter, born in Paris in 1694, was one of the most distinguished amateurs of his time, and became director of the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. He was a member of the Academy of Painting in Paris, and of the Academy of Design at Florence. He published, among other works, a "Treatise on the Engraved Gems of the Royal Cabinet." Died in 1774.

Marignolli, de, dȧ mȧ rēn-yōl'lee, (GIOVANNI,) known also as John of Florence, a Franciscan monk of Italy, born about 1288. In 1338 he was one of four clerics sent from Avignon by Pope Benedict XII. to the Khan of Cathay, (China.) In 1342 they arrived at Pekin, in 1348 went to Malabar, in India, and in 1353 Marignolli was again at the papal court. He was afterwards made Bishop of Bisignano, and thereafter was a chaplain to the emperor Charles IV., who caused him to write "Monumenta Historica Bohemiæ," in which he curiously interpolated stories of his adventures in the East. The passages of this description were put together and translated by H. Yule, (1866.)

Marigny, de, deh mȧ'rèn'ye', (ABEL FRANÇOIS POISSON—pwȧ'sôN',) MARQUIS, a French architect, born in Paris in 1727, was a brother of Madame de Pompadour, through whose influence he was appointed in 1751 director-general of the royal buildings. Died in 1781.

Marigny, de, (ENGUERRAND,) a French statesman, filled several high offices under Philippe le Bel, and attained the rank of prime minister. Soon after the accession of Louis X., he was condemned to death on the false accusations of his enemies, and executed about 1315.

Marigny, de, (FRANÇOIS AUGIER,) a French Orientalist and historian, born about 1690. He produced a "History of the Twelfth Century," (5 vols., 1750,) and a "History of the Arabs under the Government of the Caliphs," (4 vols., 1750.) Died in Paris in 1762.

Marigny, de, (GASPARD AUGUSTIN RENÉ BERNARD,) a French officer, born at Luçon in 1754, was one of the royalist chiefs in the Vendean war. He was condemned to death by his own party for alleged neglect of duty, and executed in 1794.

Marigny, de, (JACQUES CARPENTIER,) a French priest, noted for his wit, born near Nevers. He wrote several poems, and Letters, (1678.) Died in 1670.

Marillac, de, deh mȧ're'yȧk', (CHARLES,) an able French negotiator, born in Auvergne about 1510. He was chosen Archbishop of Vienne, and conducted successfully some important negotiations in Germany and Rome. He was at the head of a small number of French bishops known by their tendency to a philosophic spirit. Died in 1560.

Marillac, de, (LOUIS,) a nephew of the preceding, was born in Auvergne in 1572. He served with distinction in the armies of Henry IV., and was made a marshal of France in 1629. Being afterwards suspected of conspiring against Cardinal Richelieu, he was executed, on a charge of peculation, in 1632.

See "Procès du Maréchal de Marillac," etc., 1633; RICHELIEU, "Journal."

Marillac, de, (MICHEL,) a French statesman, brother of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1563. He was appointed by Cardinal Richelieu keeper of the seals, (1626.) Having subsequently incurred the enmity of the cardinal, he was imprisoned at Châteaudun in 1630, where he died in 1632.

Marin. See MARINUS OF TYRE.

Marin, mȧ'rȧN', a French mechanician, and a native of Lisieux, invented the air-gun, which he exhibited in the presence of Henry of Navarre.

Marin, (FRANÇOIS LOUIS CLAUDE,) a French littérateur, born in Provence in 1721. Among his principal works is a "History of Saladin, Sultan of Egypt," etc. Died in 1809.

Marin, (MICHEL ANGE,) a French ecclesiastic and devotional writer, born at Marseilles in 1697. He published "Lives of the Hermits of the East," (3 vols. 4to, 1761,) and numerous other works. Died in 1767.

Marina, mȧ-ree'nȧ, Malinche, mȧ-lèn'chȧ, written also Malintzin, the daughter of a Mexican chief, born about 1505, was sold as a slave, and subsequently fell into the hands of Cortez, whom she accompanied in all his expeditions. She possessed rare beauty and talents, and, from her knowledge of the Spanish as well as Mexican languages, was of great service as an interpreter. After the death of Cortez, she was married to Don Juan de Xamarillo, a Spanish officer. Marina has been celebrated by the Spanish poet Moratin in his "Noves de Cortés."

Marinus OF TYRE, [Fr. MARIN DE TYRE, mȧ'rȧN deh tÈR,] a Greek geographer, who lived about 150 A.D. His works were highly esteemed by his contemporaries, but none of them are extant.

See UKERT, "Geographie der Griechen und Römer."

Mario, mȧ're-ō, (GIUSEPPE,) Marchese di Candia, an Italian operatic singer, born at Cagliari, Sardinia, in 1808, of a noble but impoverished family. In 1830 he accepted a commission in the Sardinian army, but tendered his resignation in 1836, and, when it was not accepted, he escaped to Paris. His exquisite tenor voice gained him a great reputation in amateur circles, and he was reluctantly induced to accept the munificent offers of the director of the Paris Opera. Under the assumed name of Mario, he made his first public appearance December 1, 1838, in the rôle of "Robert le Diable." His success was immediate. In 1839, while still attached to the Paris Opera, he sang for a brief period in London, and was greeted with favour. In 1840 he passed over to the Italian Opera, and for several years he sang each season in both Paris and London. In 1849 he went to Saint Petersburg. In 1854–55 he accompanied Grisi on a tour through the United States. He had been living with Grisi for some years, and on the dissolution of her first marriage was legally united to her. On June 18, 1871, he took his farewell of the operatic stage at Covent Garden, London. In 1872 he again visited the United States on a concert tour. Died at Rome, December 11, 1883.

Mario Nuzzi. See FIORI, DE', (MARIO.)

Mär'ĭ-ŏn, (FRANCIS,) a celebrated American general of the Revolution, was born in South Carolina in 1732. Soon after the breaking out of the war he entered the army, and assisted in the defence of Sullivan's Island against the British in 1776. The enemy having taken possession of Georgia and besieged Charleston, Marion raised a brigade of soldiers, at the head of whom he carried on for more than three years a guerilla warfare, often attended with brilliant successes, and baffling all the attempts of the British generals to effect his capture. Died in 1795.

Marion Delorme. See DELORME.

Marion-Dufresne, mȧ're'ôN' dü'frĕn', (NICOLAS THOMAS,) a French navigator, born at Saint-Malo in 1729, sailed on a voyage of discovery to the South Sea in 1771. Soon after landing at New Zealand, Marion was treacherously murdered by the natives, together with the greater part of his men, (1772.)

Marion du Mersan, mȧ're'ôN' dü mĕR'sôN', (THÉOPHILE,) a French antiquary and dramatist, born in 1780, published a great number of popular comedies and prose essays on various subjects. Died in 1849.

Mariotte, mȧ're'ot', (EDME,) an eminent French mathematician and physicist, was a resident of Dijon. He was one of the earliest experimental philosophers in France, and discovered the law of elastic fluids called by his name. Among his principal works are his "Discourse on the Nature of Air," (1676,) "Treatise on the Movement of Waters," (1690,) "Experiments on the Colours and Congelation of Water," and an "Essay on Logic," which is highly commended by Condorcet. Died in 1684.

See CONDORCET, "Éloges des Académiciens," etc.; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mar'iscal, (IGNACIO,) a Mexican statesman, born at Oajaca in 1829. He studied law, and was a judge of the supreme court 1862–63 and 1868. He occupied a number of posts under the government, was secretary of legation at Washington 1863–68, and minister there 1869–71 and 1872–77. After a ministry to Great Britain 1883–84, President Diaz appointed him secretary of foreign affairs, a post he had filled several times before.

Mariti, mȧ-ree'tee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian traveller and writer, born at Florence in 1736, visited the isle of Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine, and published in 1769 an account of his journey, which was translated into French, German, and Swedish. Died in 1806.

Maritz, mȧ'rits or mȧ'rĕts', (JEAN,) a Swiss mechanician, born at Berne in 1711, invented a machine for boring and turning cannon. For this service he was ennobled by the French government. Died in 1790.

Mariuccia. See MAROZIA.

Mā'rĭ-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman general, distinguished for his splendid talents, indomitable energy, and unprincipled ambition, was born near Arpinum (now Arpino) in 157 B.C. His parents were poor and plebeian. He served under Scipio Africanus at the siege of Numantia, and was chosen tribune of the people in 119. He obtained the prætorship in 115, though strongly opposed by the patrician party, and about the same time married Julia, an aunt of Julius Cæsar. Having accompanied Metellus as legate and second in command into Africa, (109 B.C.,) he won such popularity by his skill and bravery that he was elected consul for 107 B.C. and intrusted with the command of the Jugurthine war. He defeated Jugurtha, who was made prisoner in 106. In 104 B.C. Marius was again chosen consul, as being the only one capable of defending the state from the threatened invasion of the Teutones and Cimbri. He defeated the barbarians at Aix, (Aquæ Sextiæ,) in Gaul, in 102 B.C. Having been elected consul the next year, for the fifth time, Marius, in conjunction with Catulus, gained a signal and overwhelming victory over the Cimbri in the plain of Vercellæ, (Vercelli.) By the aid of the tribune Saturninus, Marius became consul for 100 B.C., in spite of the determined hostility of the patricians. During this consulate an agrarian law was passed, and Metellus Numidicus was exiled for refusing to conform to it. On the expiration of his term of office, Marius went to Asia, under the pretext of sacrificing to Cybele, but really in order to excite Mithridates to a war with Rome, that he might again distinguish himself in his congenial element. In 90 B.C. both Marius and Sulla entered the service of the consuls Octavius and Cinna in the Marsian or Social war; but, jealous of the reputation of his rival, the former soon resigned. Sulla, having become consul in 88 B.C., obtained the command in the Mithridatic war, upon which Marius, assisted by his friends, caused a law to be passed transferring it to him. He was soon driven from the city by Sulla and his adherents, and forced to take refuge in Africa. When Sextilius, Governor of Libya, sent him orders to leave the country, on pain of being treated as an enemy, Marius replied to the messenger, "Go tell him that you have seen the exile Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage." The next year, while Sulla was absent in Greece, Marius, joined by the consul Cinna, entered Rome and ordered a general massacre of the opposite party. Among the patricians who perished was M. Antonius, the orator so highly praised by Cicero. Marius and Cinna became consuls, (86 B.C.,) but the former was attacked by a fever, of which he died the same year.

Marius, (CAIUS,) nephew and adopted son of the preceding, took refuge, after the proscription of his uncle, with Hiempsal, King of Numidia. He was made consul in 82 B.C., and signalized himself by many acts of injustice and cruelty. Having been defeated by Sulla, he caused himself to be killed by one of his officers.

Marius, (MARCUS AURELIUS,) one of the Thirty Tyrants of Gaul, was, on the death of Victorinus the Younger, chosen emperor by the army. He was assassinated about 268 A.D., after a reign of a few months.

Marivaux, de, dĕh mȧ're'vō', (PIERRE CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN,) a French novelist and dramatic writer born in Paris in 1688. His principal works are his romances entitled "Marianne" and "Le Paysan parvenu," which enjoyed great popularity at the time, and were among the first novels which delineated real life and manners. He also wrote a number of comedies. The affected style and false sentiment of these productions have given rise to the term marivaudage. "Never," says La Harpe, "did any one turn common thoughts in so many ways, each more affected than the last;" and Voltaire, admitting that Marivaux knew "the paths to the heart," maintains that "he was ignorant of the high-road." He was elected to the French Academy in 1743, having Voltaire for a competitor. Died in 1763.

Marivetz, de, dĕh mȧ're'vȧ', (ÉTIENNE CLÉMENT,) BARON, a French savant, born at Langres in 1728, published several treatises on physics, etc. He was executed, by order of the Revolutionary Tribunal, in 1793.

Marjolin, mär'zhō'lăN', (JEAN NICOLAS,) a French writer and surgeon, born in 1780; died in 1850.

Mark, [Gr. Μάρκος; Lat. MAR'CUS; It. MAR'CO; Fr. MARC, märk,] SAINT, THE EVANGELIST. He was a companion of Saint Peter in his travels, (see I. Peter v. 13,) and is supposed to have planted the Church at Alexandria. The early Christian writers believed that he was the interpreter of Saint Peter, and that he wrote his Gospel in Greek, under the direction and with the approbation of that apostle. Saint Augustine thought it was an abridgment of the Gospel of Matthew. According to tradition, he suffered martyrdom in Egypt in 68 A.D. By many critics he is identified with John surnamed Mark, who was a companion of Paul and Barnabas in their mission to the Gentiles about 45 A.D., (Acts xii. 12, 25, xiii. 13, xv. 37,) and who was in Rome with Paul in 63 A.D.

Mark'ham, (Sir CLEMENT ROBERTS,) F.R.S., an English author, was born at Stillingfleet, Yorkshire, July 20, 1830. He was a naval officer from 1844 to 1851, entered the civil service in 1855, and afterwards was employed in the India Office. He visited the Arctic regions in 1850–51, travelled extensively in Peru, (1852,) and introduced successfully the culture of cinchona-trees into India, (1860–61,) carrying the plants from South America. He was attached to the British army in Abyssinia, 1867–68. He wrote a "Quichua Grammar and Dictionary," (1863,) "Memoir of the Countess of Chinchon," (1875,) "Peruvian Bark," (1880,) "Life of Columbus," (1892,) etc. He was knighted in 1896. His brother, ALBERT HASTINGS MARKHAM, born in 1841, was an Arctic voyager and writer on polar research, and was made a rear-admiral in 1892.

Markham, (EDWIN,) an American poet, was born at Oregon City, Oregon, in 1852. He lived as a boy on a California farm, graduated from the State Normal School in San Francisco, and became a teacher. He grew suddenly famous through his poem "The Man with the Hoe," (1899,) based on Millet's picture of that title. It was treated as indicating the oppression of the labourer, and had an extraordinary success. He subsequently devoted himself to literary work.

Markham, mark'ăm, (GERVASE,) an English soldier and miscellaneous writer, born in Nottinghamshire about 1570, served in the royalist army in the civil war. He was the author of a tragedy entitled "Herod and Antipater," "The Poem of Poems, or Sion's Muse," etc., and other works. Died about 1655.

Mark'land, (JEREMIAH,) an eminent English scholar and critic, born in Lancashire in 1693. He published editions of the "Sylvæ" of Statius (1728) and the "Supplices" of Euripides, which are esteemed masterpieces of acute criticism. He also assisted Dr. Taylor in preparing his editions of Demosthenes and Lysias, and published "Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus," etc., in which he attempts to prove them spurious. Died in 1776.

Markof, mar'kof, Markov, or Markow, (ARCADI IVANOVITCH,) COUNT, a Russian diplomatist. On the accession of Alexander I. he was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to France, (1800.)

Marlborough, mâl'bŭr-ŭh, (popularly called in French MALBROUK, mäl'brook';) Sp. MAMBRU, mâm-broo',) DUKE OF, originally John Churchill, an English general, whose military genius and triumphs have been equalled by those of few men of modern times, was born at Ashe, in Devonshire, June 24, 1650. He was the son of Sir Winston Churchill and of Elizabeth Drake. His education was rather defective. He received from nature an eminently handsome person, a bland temper, and all the qualities essential to a successful general and courtier. In 1672, with the rank of captain, he served in the army which fought in alliance with France against the Dutch. His bravery in this and the ensuing campaigns attracted the favourable notice of Turenne and Louis XIV. At the peace of 1678 he returned to England, and married Sarah Jennings, whose talents and imperious temper enabled her to exert an important influence over his political conduct.

He was the favourite attendant and confidential agent of the Duke of York before his accession as James II., in 1685; and soon after that event he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Churchill of Sandridge. Having contributed to the defeat of Monmouth at Sedgemoor, he was made a major-general. His wife was the favourite of the king's daughter, Princess Anne, over whom she had a complete ascendency. In the combinations and intrigues which preceded the revolution of 1688, Lord Churchill acted with deep duplicity. After secretly committing himself to the cause of William of Orange, he professed his devotion to James in November, 1688, and, a few days later, deserted to the stronger party. He was created Earl of Marlborough on the accession of William III., (1689,) and made a lord of the bedchamber.

He commanded the English forces employed against the French in the Low Countries in 1689, and led a successful expedition against Cork and Kinsale in September, 1690. While he was thus trusted by William and hated as an arch-traitor by the Jacobites, he opened a treasonable correspondence with the dethroned king, who was at Saint Germain's. According to Macaulay, he undertook to corrupt the army, with which his brilliant successes and winning manners rendered him a favourite in spite of his sordid avarice. The country being apprised of this plot, he was deprived of his offices in January, 1692, and committed to the Tower a few months later. Though he was quickly admitted to bail, he passed the next four years in disgrace. About the end of 1696 he was restored to his military rank and command, and admitted to the privy council. (Respecting Macaulay's charges against Marlborough, see J. Paget's "New Examen," 1861, and the "Quarterly Review" for April, 1868.)

In 1701, William took Marlborough to Holland, gave him command of his army, and invested him with ample powers to negotiate with the allies in relation to the impending war of the Spanish succession. He displayed here the sagacity and address of a consummate diplomatist. The accession of Queen Anne, in March, 1702, opened to him a brilliant career of glory abroad and power at home. He became commander-in-chief of the allied army, and at the end of the campaign in Flanders, December, 1702, was created Duke of Marlborough. About this time he and Prince Eugene began to act in concert, and formed a cordial friendship, which greatly promoted the success of the allies. Among their most celebrated achievements was the decisive victory at Blenheim over the French marshal Tallard, August 13, 1704. Marlborough gained a great victory at Ramillies in 1706, and shared with Eugene the triumph at Oudenarde in 1708. The allies also claimed the victory over Marshal Villars at Malplaquet, (1709,) although their loss amounted, it is said, to 25,000 men.

During these foreign transactions, Godolphin, the duke's personal and political friend, had been the head of the English Tory ministry. The Tories, who had the warm sympathy of the queen, wished to discontinue the war, and fomented intrigues against Marlborough. His duchess, a zealous Whig, with much importunity prevailed on him to coalesce with the Whigs, who insisted on prolonging the war. The fondness of the queen for the Duchess of Marlborough was at length turned into violent aversion. The Tories obtained a complete ascendency in 1710, and Marlborough was dismissed with disgrace from all his employments at the end of 1711. On the accession of George I. (1714) he was restored to favour, and again became captain-general and master of the ordnance. He died in 1722, leaving his titles and estate to the male heirs of his daughter, who was married to Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland.

Marlborough, (SARAH JENNINGS,) DUCHESS OF, the wife of the preceding, born in 1660, was celebrated for her beauty, ambition, and political influence. She was brought up from childhood with the princess Anne, who regarded her with romantic fondness, combined with the deference which the weak feel for superior minds. Impatient of the restraints of etiquette, Anne, in conversation and correspondence with her favourite, assumed the name of Mrs. Morley, and addressed her friend as Mrs. Freeman. In 1678 Miss Jennings was married to Colonel Churchill, in whom she found an uxorious husband. "History," says Macaulay, "exhibits to us few spectacles more remarkable than that of a great and wise man who could carry into effect vast and profound schemes of policy only by inducing one foolish woman, who was often unmanageable, to manage another woman who was more foolish still. . . . To the last hour of her husband's life, she enjoyed the pleasure and distinction of being the one human being who was able to mislead that far-sighted and sure-footed judgment, who was fervently loved by that cold heart and servilely feared by that intrepid spirit." Having been supplanted in the royal favour by Mrs. Masham, she was dismissed from court in 1710, and became an inveterate misanthrope. Died in 1744.

Mar'litt, (E.,) the pseudonym of the German novelist Eugenie John, was born at Arnstadt, Thuringia, in 1829. She was for a time on the operatic stage, but after 1863 wrote a long series of romances and novels, many of which were translated into English. Died in 1887.

Marlowe, mar'lo, (CHRISTOPHER,) an English dramatist, born at Canterbury in 1564. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1587. He afterwards devoted himself to dramatic writing, and, according to some authorities, became an actor. He was addicted to low vices, and was killed in a quarrel with a footman in 1593. The principal dramas known to be his are "The Jew of Malta," "Edward the Second," and "The Tragical History, etc. of Dr. Faustus:" the last-named was the original of Goethe's celebrated "Faust." Marlowe is characterized by the French critic Villemain as a genius, whose rude dramas, disorderly as his life, contain splendid beauties and a gloomy audacity, the influence of which has not been lost upon Shakspeare. His "Faust" is less elegant and less ironical than that of Goethe, but every thing that the pathos of such a subject can effect—the fever of doubt in a superstitious imagination, the boldness of impiety in a despairing heart—stamps this work with the impress of extraordinary power. His "Edward II." was greatly admired by Charles Lamb, who says that one of its scenes moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern.

Marlowe, (JULIA,) an American actress, born at Caldbeck, England, in 1870, and taken to the United States at five years of age. Her theatrical career began with child parts in light opera and drama, her first mature part being Parthenia, in "Ingomar," in 1888. Since that date she has been a favourite in Shakspearean and other leading parts. Married Robert Taber, leading man for several seasons in her company.

Marmier, măr'me-ā', (XAVIER,) a French littérateur and traveller, was born at Pontarlier in 1809. He published, among other works, "Studies on Goethe," "Poetic Sketches," and "History of Literature in Denmark and Sweden," (1839,) and made numerous translations from the English and German. Died October 11, 1892.

Mar'mĭ-ŏn, (SHAKERLY,) an English dramatist, born in Northamptonshire in 1602. His principal works are the comedies of "Holland's Leaguer," "A Fine Companion," and "The Antiquary." Died in 1639.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica;" WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Marmitta, mar-mĕt'tä, (LUDOVICO,) an Italian gem-engraver, born at Parma. Among his master-pieces is a cameo representing a head of Socrates. He lived about 1500.

Marmol, de, dā mar-mōl', (LUIS CARAVAJAL,) a Spanish writer, born at Granada about 1520, accompanied the emperor Charles V. in his African campaigns. He wrote a "General Description of Africa," (1599,) and a "History of the Rebellion, etc. of the Moors of Granada," (1600.)

See TICKNOR, "History of Spanish Literature;" PRESCOTT, "History of Philip II.," vol. iii. book v.

Marmont, de, dĕh măr'mŏn', (AUGUSTE FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS VIESSE,) Duke of Ragusa, a celebrated French marshal, born at Châtillon-sur-Seine in 1774, received his military education at the artillery school of Châlons. He accompanied Bonaparte as aide-de-camp in the Italian campaign of 1794, and, as general of brigade, took part in the invasion of Egypt in 1798. He fought with distinguished bravery at the battle of Marengo, (1800,) obtained command of a division, and was appointed inspector-general of artillery about 1802. Having assisted at the capture of Ulm, in 1805, Marmont became in 1806 general-in-chief of the army in Dalmatia, and gained a signal victory over a superior force of Russians and Montenegrins at Castelnuovo. In 1807 he carried out a system of public works, the most important of which was a line of road-way two hundred and ten miles in length; and for this service he was created Duke of Ragusa. Soon after the battle of Wagram (1809) he was made a marshal of France, and appointed Governor-General of the Illyrian provinces. As commander of the second corps, in 1813 he took part in the battles of Bautzen, Dresden, and Leipsic, and closed the campaign of 1814 by his engagement near Paris with the allied army of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, (March 30.) Though contending against a greatly superior force, Marmont and Mortier refused to capitulate until authorized to do so by Joseph Bonaparte. In April, 1814, Marshal Marmont, after stipulating with Prince Schwarzenberg for the withdrawal of the French troops into Normandy, entered the service of the allies. He subsequently filled several high offices under the Bourbons. Being called upon to suppress the revolt of July, 1830, he brought great opprobrium upon himself by his failure in this difficult task; his name was struck off the army list, and he was exiled. He died at Venice in 1852, leaving "Mémoires du Duc de Raguse," (8 vols., 1856.)

Marmontel, măr'mŏn'tĕl', (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a celebrated French critic and miscellaneous writer, born in Limousin in 1723. His family was poor, and he was educated in the Jesuits' College at Mauriac, but he did not enter their order. At an early age he acquired the friendship and patronage of Voltaire, on whose recommendation he visited Paris in 1746, and published the same year a translation of Pope's "Rape of the Lock." He brought out in 1748 his "Dionysius the Tyrant," ("Denys le Tyran,") which was soon followed by "Aristomène" and "Cléopâtre," three tragedies, which had considerable success at the time. His "Moral Tales" ("Contes moraux," 1761) were received with extraordinary favour, and were translated into the principal languages of Europe, including Danish and Hungarian. They are written with great elegance and animation; though their morality is often questionable. About this time Marmontel was imprisoned for a short time in the Bastille, on a false accusation of having satirized a person of rank. He published in 1763 his "Poétique Française," and in 1767 his political romance of "Bélisaire," which obtained great popularity and has taken its place among the classics of the language. The empress Catherine II. ordered a translation of it into Russian, and versions of it appeared in nearly all the European languages. Some passages in the book, however, which favoured toleration, were denounced by the Sorbonne, and the work was condemned by the Archbishop of Paris, as containing impious and heretical propositions. In the exciting controversy which followed, Voltaire took an active part, and published several witty and caustic pamphlets in defence of his protégé. Marmontel was soon after appointed historiographer of France. Among the most important of his other works we may name "Les Incas," a romance, dedicated to Gustavus III. of Sweden, the comic operas of "Le Huron," "Sylvain," and "Zémire et Azor," and the tragedy of "Les Héraclides," which is highly commended by La

Harpe. His "Eléments de Littérature" (6 vols., 1787) is also ranked among his best productions. In 1783 Marmontel succeeded D'Alembert as perpetual secretary of the French Academy. He lived in retirement in the country during the greater part of the Revolution, and died in 1799, leaving "Mémoires" of his life. He had married about 1778 the niece of Abbé Morellet.

Marmora, della, del'lä mar'mo-rä, (ALBERTO Ferrero—fêr-rā'ro,) COUNT, a Sardinian general and savant, born in 1789. He entered the French army, and rose to be military commander in the island of Sardinia in 1849. He published "Travels in Sardinia; or, Statistical, Physical, and Political Description of that Island."

Marmora, della, (ALESSANDRO FERRERO,) brother of the preceding, born in 1799, fought in the war for Italian independence in 1848, and became a major-general. He died in the Crimea in 1855.

Marmora, della, (ALFONSO FERRERO,) an Italian general and statesman, brother of the preceding, was born in Turin in 1804. He was appointed minister of war by the King of Sardinia in November, 1849, resigned in February, 1855, and the same year took command of the Sardinian forces in the Crimean war, after which he again served as minister of war. He was president of the Council of Ministers from July, 1859, to July, 1860. In September, 1864, he became minister of foreign affairs and president of the Council of Ministers in the kingdom of Italy. He was succeeded by Ricasoli in June, 1866, took command of the army, and was defeated by the archduke Albert of Austria, at Custozza, in July of the same year. Died at Florence, January 8, 1878.

Marmora, della, (CARLO FERRERO,) MARQUIS, Prince of Masserano, eldest brother of the preceding, was born in 1788. Having been made lieutenant-general and senator of the kingdom of Sardinia, he accompanied Charles Albert as first aide-de-camp in the campaigns of 1848 and 1849. Died in 1854.

Marnix de Saint-Aldegonde, van, vän mär'nèks' deh sänt'täl'deh-gônd', (PHILIPPE,) an eminent Flemish writer and Protestant Reformer, was born at Brussels in 1538. He studied at Geneva, where he acquired the friendship of Calvin and adopted his faith. In 1566 he drew up the celebrated formulary of the Flemish nobles against the Inquisition. As burgomaster of Antwerp, he defended that city in 1584 against Alexander, Duke of Parma; but he was forced to capitulate in 1585. He was the author of a "Picture of the Difference between the Christian Religion and Popery," and "The Romish Bee-Hive." He also translated the Psalms into Dutch verse, and was engaged on a Flemish version of the Scriptures when he died, in 1598. "He was," says Motley, "a man of most rare and versatile genius. Scholar, theologian, diplomatist, swordsman, orator, poet, pamphleteer, he had genius for all things, and was eminent in all."

Marquette, mȧR'kĕt', (Jacques,) a celebrated French missionary and discoverer, was born in Picardy. He travelled and laboured several years in Canada and other regions. The first Europeans who are certainly known to have discovered and explored the Mississippi River were Father Marquette and M. Joliet, who in 1673 conducted a small exploring party from Quebec. Entering the great river at the mouth of the Wisconsin, they descended in canoes nearly to the mouth of the Arkansas, or to latitude 34°, which they reached in July, 1673. They were deterred from pursuing the voyage by reports that the river below was infested by armed savages, and they returned in canoes to the mouth of the Illinois, which they ascended. Marquette wrote a narrative of this expedition, which was published in Paris in 1681. "He writes," says Professor Sparks, "as a scholar and as a man of careful observation and practical sense. In every point of view, this tract is one of the most interesting among those that illustrate the early history of America." Having resumed his missionary labours among the Miamis on Lake Michigan, he died there in 1675.

Mars, [Gr. Ἄρης, (Ares;) It. Marte, maR'tȧ,] the name of the Roman god of war, was a contraction of Mavors. He was supposed to be a son of Jupiter and Juno, and was identified with the Ares of Greek mythology. According to Ovid, he was a son of Juno, but had no father. He was worshipped with extraordinary honours by the Romans, of whom he was one of the tutelary deities. Homer and other poets relate that Mars fought for the Trojans at the siege of Troy and was wounded by Diomede. He was called Gradivus, Quirinus, Mavors, Salisubulus, Mamers, Enyalus, and Camulus. The amours of Mars and Venus are very celebrated. He was said to be the father of Romulus, Remus, Cupid, Harmonia, and Meleager. Ares was one of the twelve great Olympian gods of the Greeks, and was especially worshipped in Thrace. According to tradition, he fled to Egypt during the contest between Typhon and the gods, and changed himself into a fish. Having killed a son of Neptune, he was prosecuted before the Areopagus (Mars Hill) at Athens, and was acquitted. Mars was believed to love war for its own sake, and to delight in carnage. He is usually represented as a grim soldier in full armour,—sometimes as driving furiously in a war-chariot.

Mars, marz or mȧrs, (ANNE FRANÇOISE HIPPOLYTE Boutet Monvel—boo'tā' môn'vĕl',) MADEMOISELLE, a celebrated French actress, born in Paris in 1779. She was the daughter of Monvel, a popular actor at the Théâtre Français, and an actress named Mars, and was early trained for the stage. She excelled in genteel comedy, in which she was considered unrivalled among the actors of her time. She retired from the stage in 1841. Died in 1847.

Marschall von Bieberstein, maR'shȧl fon bee'bĕr-stīn', (FRIEDRICH,) FREIHERR, a German botanist, born in 1766, removed to Russia, where he became a councillor of state. He published "Flora Taurico-Caucasica," (1808–19.) Died in 1826.

Marschner, maRsh'nĕr, (HEINRICH,) a German composer and musician, born at Zittau in 1795, was appointed chapel-master at Hanover. Among his most popular works are the operas of "The Vampyre," "The Templar and the Jewess," and "Hans Heiling." Died in 1861.

Mars'den, (WILLIAM,) an eminent Orientalist, of English extraction, born at Dublin in 1754. Having entered the service of the East India Company, he sailed in 1771 to Bencoolen, Sumatra, where he was appointed principal secretary to the government and devoted himself to the study of the Malay language. He returned in 1779 to England, and was soon after elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He published in 1782 his "History of Sumatra," which was very favourably received and was translated into French and German. He was subsequently appointed chief secretary to the board of admiralty, with the war salary of £4000 per annum. Having resigned this post in 1807, he brought out in 1812 his "Grammar" and "Dictionary" of the Malay language, which are esteemed standard works. He also made an excellent translation of the "Travels of Marco Polo," with a commentary, and wrote a description of Eastern coins, entitled "Numismata Orientalia Illustrata," (1823.) He gave up his pension to the government in 1831, and soon after presented his valuable collection of coins and medals to the British Museum, and his library to King's College. Died in 1836.

Marsh, (ANNA CALDWELL,) MRS., an English authoress, born in Staffordshire about 1798. Among her most popular works are "Tales of the Woods and Fields," (1836.) "Ravenscliffe," "Mount Sorel," (1843,) and "Emilia Wyndham," (1846.) Died October 5, 1874.

Marsh, (DEXTER,) an American geologist, born in 1806, made a large and choice collection of specimens of fossil footprints, obtained chiefly in the Connecticut valley. Died in 1853.

Marsh, (GEORGE PERKINS,) LL.D., an American philologist, born at Woodstock, Vermont, March 15, 1801. He was appointed minister to Turkey in 1849, in 1852 was sent on an embassy to Greece, and in 1861 was appointed minister to Italy. His chief published works are a "Compendious Grammar of the Old Northern or Icelandic Language, compiled and translated from the Grammar of Rask," (1838,) "Lectures on the English Language," (1861,) "The Origin and History of the English Language," (1862,) "Man and Nature," (1864,) enlarged and re-written, and issued in 1874 under the title of "The Earth as Modified by Human Action." He died July 24, 1882. His wife, Caroline C. Marsh, has published a number of poems and made translations from the German.

Marsh, (HERBERT,) a learned English theologian, born in London in 1757. He became professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1807, and rose to be Bishop of Peterborough in 1819. He published several religious and controversial treatises, and translated Michaelis's "Introduction to the New Testament" into English. Died in 1839.

Marsh, (JAMES,) an English chemist, born in 1789, was the inventor of an apparatus, called by his name, which detects the presence of arsenic in liquids, however minute the quantity. Its utility and certainty were verified by Orfila and other toxicologists. Died in 1846.

Marsh, (JAMES,) D.D., a distinguished American scholar and divine, born at Hartford, Vermont, in 1794. He was appointed professor of classics at Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, and in 1826 president of the University of Vermont. He translated from the German Herder's "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," and contributed religious and philosophical essays to the "Christian Spectator" and other journals. Died at Colchester, Vermont, July 3, 1842.

Marsh, (NARCISSUS,) a learned prelate, born in Wiltshire in 1638, became successively Archbishop of Dublin and of Armagh. He wrote an "Essay on an Introduction to the Theory of Sounds," which was inserted in the "Philosophical Transactions" of the Royal Society. Died in 1713.

Marsh, (OTHNIEL CHARLES,) an eminent American palæontologist, born at Lockport, New York, October 29, 1831. He graduated at Yale in 1860, studied (1862–65) at Berlin, Breslau, and Heidelberg, and in 1866 was appointed professor of palæontology in Yale College. Professor Marsh was distinguished for the astonishing number and great importance of his discoveries of new species of extinct vertebrate animals, very largely from the Rocky Mountain region. He was author of "Odontornithes," (1880,) "Dinocerata," (1884,) "Sauropoda," (1888,) etc., with a large number of scientific papers. Died March 18, 1899.

Mar'shall, (ALFRED,) an English economist, was born at London in 1842, and became professor of political economy at Cambridge in 1885. His best-known work is "Principles of Economics," (1890.)

Mar'shall, (CHARLES KIMBALL,) an American Methodist divine, born at Durham, Maine, in 1812, became pastor of a church at Natchez, Mississippi.

Mar'shall, (EMMA, née Martin,) an English novelist, born near Cromer about 1832. Of her very numerous tales, "Mrs. Mainwaring's Journal" (1874) and "Life's Aftermath" (1876) are among the best-known.

Marshall, (HUMPHREY,) an American soldier and lawyer, born in Frankfort, Kentucky, January 13, 1812. He graduated at West Point in 1832, but left the army in 1833, and became a prominent lawyer and politician, being twice sent to Congress. He was a colonel of volunteer cavalry in the Mexican war, and a major-general in the Confederate service, 1861–65. Died at Louisville, March 28, 1872. He was a grandson of Humphry Marshall, noticed below.

Marshall, (HUMPHRY,) an American botanist, was a resident of Pennsylvania. He published in 1785 his "Arbustum Americanum," or catalogue of the trees and shrubs of America, which was translated into French. He was born in 1722, and died in 1801.

Marshall, (JOHN,) an eminent American jurist and statesman, born at Germantown, Fauquier county, Virginia, on the 24th of September, 1755. JOHN MARSHALL.

May, 1777, and served at the battles of Brandywine, September, 1777, Germantown, and Monmouth, June, 1778. Having resigned his commission in 1781, he began to practise law, and was chosen a member of the House of Delegates in 1782. In 1783 he married Mary Willis Ambler, of York, Virginia, and became a resident of Richmond. As a member of the Convention of Virginia, in 1788, he advocated the adoption of the Federal Constitution by several powerful speeches. He contributed more to the adoption of this Constitution by Virginia than any man except James Madison. He became identified with the Federal party, and cordially supported the administration of Washington. His reputation was widely extended by a speech in the Assembly of Virginia in favour of the treaty negotiated by John Jay with Great Britain in 1794. In 1797 he was associated with General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry in a special mission to the French Directory. His inclination or interest induced him to decline several high offices, but, at the special request of General Washington, he became a candidate for Congress, and was elected, in 1799. He made a great speech in Congress, defending President Adams for his surrender of Thomas Nash, alias Robbins, who was claimed by the British government as a fugitive from justice. This speech settled forever the question whether such cases should be decided by the executive or the judiciary. "That argument," says R. W. Griswold, "deserves to be ranked among the most dignified displays of human intellect." He was appointed secretary of state by President Adams in May, 1800, and displayed great diplomatic ability in his correspondence with Rufus King, minister to England. On the 31st of January, 1801, he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of the United States. He performed the functions of this high office for thirty-four years, and rendered important services by the just and liberal principles according to which he construed the Constitution. His profound learning and wisdom, his moral courage, and his high-toned virtue secured for him universal respect and confidence. His services as an expounder of constitutional law are commended by Judge Story in the following terms: "If all others of the chief justice's judicial arguments had perished, his luminous judgments on these occasions would have given an enviable immortality to his name." In 1804 he published a "Life of George Washington," (5 vols.,) which is highly esteemed. Judge Marshall was distinguished for his benevolence, modesty, urbanity, and simplicity. He was a devout believer in Christianity, and was happy in his domestic relations. He died in Philadelphia (whither he had gone for medical advice) in July, 1835. "To one who cannot follow his great judgments," says R. W. Griswold, "in which at the same time the depths of legal wisdom are disclosed and the limits of human reason measured, the language of just eulogy must wear an appearance of extravagance. In his own profession he stands for the reverence of the wise rather than for the enthusiasm of the many."

Mar'shall or Mareschal, (THOMAS,) an English scholar, born in Leicestershire about 1621. He became successively rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, chaplain-in-ordinary to the king, and Dean of Gloucester, (1681.) He was distinguished for his knowledge of the Oriental tongues and of the Anglo-Saxon, and published "Observations on Two Ancient Versions of the Gospels,—the Gothic and the Anglo-Saxon," (in Latin, 1665,) also a "Life of Archbishop Usher." Died in 1685.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Marshall, (THOMAS FRANCIS,) an American lawyer, a nephew of Chief-Justice John Marshall. He was born at Frankfort, Kentucky, June 7, 1801, and became a highly successful lawyer of Louisville. He was also a judge and a member of Congress. As a political orator and wit he had great fame. Died at Versailles, Kentucky, September 22, 1864.

Marshall, (THOMAS WILLIAM M.,) an English theological writer, born in 1815. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and took orders in the Anglican Church. In 1845 he became a Roman Catholic, and in his "Comedy of Convocation" and "My Clerical Friends and their Relations to Modern Thought" (1873) he showed himself a vigorous satirist of his former religious associates. Among his other works are "Christian Missions, their Agents, their Methods, and their Results," (1862,) "Catholic Missions in Southern India," (1865,) and "Protestant Journalism," (1874.) Died at Surbiton, Surrey, December 14, 1877.

Marshall, (WILLIAM CALDER,) a Scottish sculptor, born in Edinburgh in 1813, was a pupil of Chantrey. He visited Rome about 1836, and settled in London in 1839. Among his chief works are "Sabrina," "Una and the Lion," the "Dancing-Girl Reposing," (1846,) which gained a prize of five hundred pounds, and a statue of Sir Robert Peel. Died June 16, 1894.

Marshall, (WILLIAM HUMPHREY,) an English botanist and agricultural writer, born in 1745. He published a number of works which contributed greatly to the improvement of agriculture in England. He also wrote "The American Grove; or, Catalogue of the Trees, etc. of the United States." Died in 1818.

Marsh'am, (Sir JOHN,) an English chronologist, born in London in 1602. He embraced the cause of the royalists in the civil war. He was the author of a work entitled "Chronologicus Canon Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus," etc., (1672,) in which he attempts to reconcile Egyptian chronology with the Hebrew Scriptures, by supposing four collateral dynasties of Egyptian kings reigning at the same time. This theory has been adopted by several eminent scholars. Died in 1685.

Marsh'man, (JOSHUA,) an eminent English divine and Orientalist, born in Wiltshire in 1767. Being sent by the Baptist Missionary Society to India in 1799, he became a proficient in the Chinese, Sanscrit, and Bengalee languages. He translated the four Gospels into Chinese, and assisted Dr. Carey in preparing a Sanscrit Grammar and a Bengalee-and-English Dictionary. He also translated the works of Confucius, and wrote a "Defence of the Deity and Atonement of Jesus Christ, in Reply to Rammohun Roy," (1822.) Died in 1837.

Marsigli, maR-sèl'yee, (LUIGI FERDINANDO,) a distinguished Italian naturalist and mathematician, born at Bologna in 1658. He served in the Austrian army against the Turks in 1683 and in several succeeding campaigns, and was made a colonel in 1689. He was one of the founders of the Society of Sciences and Arts at Bologna, (1712,) to which he gave a very valuable scientific collection. He afterwards visited England, where he acquired the friendship of Newton and Halley and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was the author of "Physical History of the Sea," (1725,) a description of the shores of the Danube, entitled "Danubius Pannonico-Mysicus," etc., (1726, 7 vols. fol., finely illustrated,) "The Military State of the Ottoman Empire," (1732,) and other works. He had been elected in 1725 a member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. Died in 1730.

Marsilio (maR-see'le-o) [Lat. MARSIL'IUS] OF PADUA, an Italian jurist, sometimes called MENANDRINO, born at Padua. He was patronized by the emperor Louis of Bavaria, in whose favour he wrote his "Defensor Pacis," an attack on the papacy, for which he was excommunicated in 1327. Died in 1328.

See John xi.; Luke x.

Mar'tha, (BENJAMIN CONSTANT,) a French historian, born at Strasburg in 1820. He studied in the École Normale, and became a professor in 1865 at the Sorbonne, Paris. His chief works, "Les Moralistes sous l'Empire Romain" and "Le Poème de Lucrèce," were crowned by the Academy. Died in 1895.

Marthe, mȧrt, (ANNE Biget—be'zhȧ',) a French nun, called SISTER MARTHA, born at Besançon in 1749, devoted herself during the Revolution to the relief of the sick and wounded, and of prisoners of all nations. Died in 1824.

Marti, mar'tee, [Lat. MARTI'NUS,] (MANUEL,) a Spanish scholar and poet, born near Valencia in 1663. He published a collection of poems, entitled "Amalthea Geographica," and made several translations from the Latin. Died in 1737.

Martial, mar'she-ȧl, [Fr. MARTIAL, mȧR'se'ȧl'; Lat. MARTIA'LIS; It. MARZIALE, mart-se-ȧ'lȧ,] or, more fully, Mar'cus Vale'rius Martia'lis, a famous Latin epigrammatic poet, born at Bilbilis, in Spain, about 40 A.D., went to Rome at the age of twenty-two, and resided there thirty-five years. The events of his life are very imperfectly known; but it appears that he devoted his attention chiefly to poetry. Some epigrams which he wrote on the occasion of the public spectacles given by Titus about the year 80, procured him the favour of that prince. He was also patronized by Domitian, who made him a tribune and a Roman knight. He was intimate with Juvenal, Quintilian, and Pliny the Younger. About 98 A.D. he returned to his native place, where he died a few years later. Fourteen books of his "Epigrams" are still extant, and are much admired by some eminent critics, such as Scaliger, Lipsius, and Malte-Brun. The latter thinks his writings are among the most interesting monuments of Roman literature, though many of them offend against good taste and pure morality. Probably no poet ever estimated his works more justly than he did in the following line:

("Some are good, some indifferent, and more are bad.")

Mar'vell, (ANDREW,) an eminent English patriot and satirical writer, born at Kingston-upon-Hull in 1620. Having travelled through France, Spain, Italy, and Holland, where he acquired the languages of those countries, he was, after his return to England, appointed assistant to Milton, then Latin secretary to Cromwell, (1657.) He was first elected to Parliament in 1660, and in this office gave such entire satisfaction to his constituents that he continued to represent them till his death. Marvell's wit and distinguished abilities rendered him formidable to the corrupt administration of Charles II., and attempts were made to win him over by the offer of a large sum of money, which he promptly refused, thus proving his integrity to be equal to his talents. As a writer he is chiefly known by his "Rehearsal Transposed," written in answer to Dr. Parker, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, a fanatical defender of absolute power. Died in 1678.

Marx, (KARL,) a German socialist and agitator, born at Treves in 1818. Educated at Bonn and Berlin, he became an editor at Cologne in 1842, but in 1843 was expelled from Germany. He retired to Paris and engaged in literary work, but in 1846 was sent out of the country. In 1848 he was driven out of Belgium. He, however, was actively engaged in the German revolutionary movements of 1848–49, when he was again banished. From that time he lived mostly in London, where he became one of the leading spirits of the International Association. Among his works are "Misère de la Philosophie," (1847,) "Zur Kritik der politischen Oekonomie," (1859,) "Das Kapital," (1859,) etc. Died March 16, 1883.

Mā'rў, daughter of Henry VII. of England, was born in 1497. She became in 1514 the third wife of Louis XII. of France, who died in the following year. A few months after she was married to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. She left one daughter, named Frances, who was the mother of Lady Jane Grey. Died in 1534.

Mary, commonly called BLOODY QUEEN MARY, on account of her cruel persecution of the Protestants, daughter of Henry VIII. by his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, was born at Greenwich in 1516. During her childhood several negotiations were entered into for her marriage, none of which, however, were carried into effect. After the divorce of Catherine, the title of Princess of Wales was transferred from Mary to the princess Elizabeth. In 1536, on the execution of Queen Anne, Mary was induced to acknowledge Henry's ecclesiastical supremacy and the nullity of his marriage with her mother. Having, by her outward compliance with her father's whims, in some degree gained his favour, the inheritance was secured to her, after her brother Edward and his heirs, in the act of succession of 1544. When Edward succeeded to the throne, Mary resisted all his entreaties, and those of his ministers, to change her religious views, upon which, by the advice of Northumberland, he made over the crown to Lady Jane Grey. (See GREY, Lady JANE.) Mary's first act when established on the throne was to restore to their sees Bonner, Gardiner, and other bishops who had been deposed during the late reign; and shortly afterwards Cranmer and Latimer were committed to the Tower. These measures gave rise to an insurrection of the Protestants, headed by Sir Thomas Wyatt, in 1554, which, being soon quelled, was followed by the execution of Lady Jane Grey, her husband and father, and of Wyatt himself. In July, 1554, Mary was married to the son of Charles V., afterwards Philip II. of Spain. In the November following, Parliament passed acts restoring the authority of the pope and reviving the former statutes against heresy. From this time began a fierce persecution of the Protestants, and it is estimated that two hundred and eighty victims died at the stake between the years 1555 and 1558. Among the most eminent of these martyrs were Bishops Latimer of Worcester and Ridley of London, and Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1557 Mary was induced to assist Philip in his war against France, and the united forces of England and Spain obtained a victory over the French at Saint-Quentin. But the following year Calais was taken by the Duke of Guise. This was a severe blow to Mary, and probably hastened her death, which took place in November, 1558. She was succeeded by her half-sister Elizabeth.

Without defending the cruelties with which Mary's reign has been reproached, the candid historian will find many palliations for her conduct in the spirit of that age, which favoured persecution, in the injustice with which she had been treated by her father, and in the state of her health during that part of her reign when the persecutions were at their height, which made it impossible for her to know the true state of affairs. Froude, who will hardly be suspected of any bias in her favour, says, "To the time of her accession she had lived a blameless and, in many respects, a noble life; and few men or women have lived less capable of doing knowingly a wrong thing." He adds that her trials and disappointments, "it can hardly be doubted, affected her sanity." And he ends with laying the chief blame of the persecutions of her reign first on Gardiner, and secondly, and more especially, on Cardinal Pole.

Mary of Burgundy, [Fr. MARIE DE BOURGOGNE, mȧ're' dẹh boor'goñ',] daughter of Charles the Bold and Isabella de Bourbon, was born at Brussels in 1457. On the death of her father, in 1477, she became heiress of Burgundy, and was married the same year to the archduke Maximilian, son of the Emperor of Germany. She died in 1482, in consequence of a fall from her horse. She left two children, Philip, the father of Charles V., and Margaret, Duchess of Savoy.

Mary of Guise, (gweez,) [Fr. MARIE DE GUISE, mȧ're' dẹh gü-èz',] or Mary of Lorraine, [Fr. MARIE DE LORRAINE, mȧ're' dẹh lo'rạn',] a daughter of Claude, Duke of Guise, born in 1515, was married in 1534 to Louis d'Orléans, Duke of Longueville, who died the following year. In 1538 she was married to James V. of Scotland, and after his death became, for a short time, regent of the kingdom. She is described by the historian De Thou as naturally inclined to justice and toleration, but she was influenced by the court of France and her brothers, the Duke and Cardinal of Guise. She died in 1560, leaving a daughter Mary, afterwards the celebrated Queen of Scots.

Mary Stu'art, Queen of Scots, born at Linlithgow about the 7th of December, 1542, was the only surviving child of James V. and Mary of Guise, (or Lorraine,) who was a daughter of the French Duke of Guise. James V. died a few days after the birth of Mary, who was crowned in September, 1543, by Cardinal Beatoun. This ambitious and unscrupulous prelate, who was the head of the Roman Catholic party, usurped the office of regent. A treaty having been negotiated for the marriage of Mary with the Dauphin of France, she was sent to France in the summer of 1548 to complete her education. Before the year just mentioned, Scotland had been involved in a war against Henry VIII. of England, who wished to obtain the hand of Mary for his son and thus unite the two countries under one crown.

Educated at the polite and voluptuous court of Paris, Mary excelled in various accomplishments, and at an early age became mistress of the Latin, French, and Italian languages. About the age of fourteen she composed and pronounced before Henry II. a Latin oration, in which she maintained that it is becoming for women to learn literature and liberal arts. Her rare and radiant personal beauty, her intellectual graces, and her fascinating manners rendered her a general favourite and the chief ornament of the French court. "Graceful alike in person and intellect," says Froude, "she possessed that peculiar beauty in which the form is lost in the expression, and which every painter, therefore, has represented differently. Rarely, perhaps, has any woman combined so many noticeable qualities as Mary Stuart: with a feminine insight into men and things and human life, she had cultivated herself to that high perfection in which accomplishments were no longer adventitious ornaments, but were wrought into her organic constitution. . . . She had vigour, energy, tenacity of purpose, with perfect and never-failing self-possession, and, as the one indispensable foundation for the effective use of all other qualities, she had indomitable courage." ("History of England," vol. vii. chap. iv.)

In April, 1558, she was married to the dauphin, who on the death of his father, Henry II., ascended the throne of France, as Francis II., in 1559. On the death of the English queen Mary, Francis and Mary assumed the titles of King and Queen of England, refusing to recognize the right of Elizabeth to the throne. The brilliant prospects of Mary were suddenly clouded by the death of Francis, who died, without issue, in December, 1560. One great obstacle to her prosperity was her zealous attachment to the Roman Catholic religion, which was rejected or abhorred by a majority of her subjects. The Scottish Estates sent Lord James Stuart, Mary's half-brother, to invite her to Scotland and to offer her the free exercise of her religion. Having resolved to return to her native land, she requested permission to pass through England on her way thither; but Elizabeth would not grant this favour to a rival claimant of her crown. Mary was thus reduced to the alternative of a voyage by sea, with the risk of being captured by the English fleet. She embarked in August, 1561, and parted with regret from la belle France, at which, with eyes bathed in tears, she continued to gaze until it was hidden by the darkness. After a passage of four days, she arrived safely at Leith, and chose for her chief advisers Lord James Stuart and William Maitland, of Lethington, both Protestants. She made friends even among the Protestants, but failed to propitiate John Knox, with whom she had an interview. According to Randolph, he made her weep on this occasion.

Soon after her arrival in Scotland, Mary sent Secretary Maitland to London as ambassador. He made overtures of peace and friendship, requiring, however, as an indispensable condition, that Elizabeth and the English Parliament should recognize Mary as her successor in case the former should die without issue. On this condition Mary promised she would not claim the English crown during the life of Elizabeth. "Elizabeth," says Froude, "refused positively to name Mary Stuart her successor, knowing that she would be signing her own death-warrant." These words suggest the probable assassination of Elizabeth by the partisans of her rival. Mary attempted to open the chapel royal for public Catholic service, but the Protestant mob drove away the priest with a broken head, and the queen made concession to the popular will by ordering that the service should be performed privately. In 1562 Mary wrote a letter to Elizabeth, and expressed a great desire to have an interview with her. Several courteously-worded letters were exchanged by them, and their correspondence grew more and more cordial; but a serious difference arose on the choice of a husband for Mary. Elizabeth objected to her proposed marriage with Don Carlos of Spain, and suggested Lord Robert Dudley, her own favourite; but Mary preferred her cousin Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, (a son of the Earl of Lennox,) whom she married on the 29th of July, 1565. By this act she provoked the violent hostility of the English queen, and estranged from her support her half-brother, James Stuart, Earl of Murray, the ablest Scottish statesman of his time.

"Her gentle administration," says Robertson, "had secured the hearts of her subjects, who were impatient for her marriage and wished the crown to descend in a right line from their ancient monarchs. She herself was the most amiable woman of her age. . . . No event in that age excited stronger political fears and jealousies, none interested more deeply the passions of several princes, than the marriage of the Scottish queen." ("History of Scotland.") Mary made an unwise choice at last; for the character of Darnley was at once weak, capricious, and obstinate. She gave him the title of king, by a stretch of her prerogative which, according to Robertson, was a strong proof of the violence of her love or the weakness of her counsels. Instigated by Queen Elizabeth, the Scottish malcontents, including the Earl of Murray, took arms against Mary in August, 1565; but this revolt was quickly suppressed by the queen, who rode on horseback at the head of her army, and the leaders of the insurgents took refuge in England. Elizabeth disclaimed all responsibility for their conduct, and expressed her abhorrence of their treason.

In 1566 Mary Stuart joined the King of France, the pope, and others, in a Catholic league for the extirpation of heresy, and began to attempt the restoration of popery in Scotland. "To this fatal resolution," says Robertson, "may be imputed all the subsequent calamities of Mary's life." She took into her confidence and favour David Rizzio, (or Ritzio,) an Italian musician, who became her French secretary and inseparable companion, even in the council-room. "He had the control," says Froude, "of all the business of the state." Mary soon repented of her union with the insolent and dissolute Lord Darnley, who treated her with rudeness and neglect and became jealous of Rizzio, whom he resolved to remove by violence. Rizzio was dragged from the queen's presence by the accomplices of Darnley, and killed, in March, 1566. This act was the result of a plot in which the Earl of Morton, Ruthven, Maitland, and other Protestants united for political reasons. Deserted and betrayed by Darnley, they failed to recover power, and fled to England. Although Mary deeply resented the conduct of her husband, she plied him with caresses and gained him over to her interest. About this time a new favourite acquired an ascendant over her heart and began to influence her counsels. This was James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, a man of some ability, but unscrupulous and reckless to the last degree. In June, 1566, occurred an event which apparently tended to confirm the power and promote the interest of Queen Mary,—the birth of her son James. In January, 1567, Darnley was attacked with a severe illness at Glasgow, where Mary visited him, and, having employed her artifices to gain his confidence, persuaded him to be removed to the vicinity of Edinburgh. He was lodged in a detached house at Kirk-a-Field, very near the capital. Mary attended her husband assiduously, and slept two nights in the house at Kirk-a-Field, which she left on the 9th of February at 11 P.M. About three hours later the house was blown up by gunpowder, and Darnley was found dead in the garden. Suspicion fell on Bothwell as the chief perpetrator of this crime, and on Mary as an accessary. She outraged public sentiment so far that she not only screened Bothwell from a fair trial, but married him in May, 1567. Robertson and Froude agree in the opinion that Mary was responsible for the death of Darnley.

Impelled by a just and burning indignation, the Scottish lords and people, both Protestant and Catholic, rose in arms against Mary and Bothwell, who, in June, 1567, met them at Carberry Hill with a small army. The troops of the queen, however, refused to fight, and she was compelled to surrender herself to her adversaries, who confined her on a little island in Loch Leven. Queen Elizabeth now interposed in favour of Mary, thinking the treatment she received a dangerous example, and demanded her release,—without effect. The captive queen abdicated in favour of her son, and the Earl of Murray became regent, (July, 1567.) Letters which Mary had written to Bothwell were produced in the Scottish Parliament, by which she was declared to be accessory to the murder of the king. By the aid of George Douglas, a youth of eighteen, she escaped from prison in May, 1568, and was quickly joined by an army of six thousand men, which Regent Murray routed at Langside on the 13th of May. Mary fled to England, and rashly threw herself on the generosity of her rival, who refused to admit her into her presence because she was not yet cleared from the charge of murder. Treated as a prisoner, Mary was confined at Bolton Castle, Coventry, and Fotheringay. She had many adherents in England, who made several attempts against the power and life of Elizabeth. In 1586 she was accused of complicity in Babington's conspiracy, for which she was tried by a commission, and condemned without proof. She was beheaded at Fotheringay Castle on the 8th of February, 1587.

"All contemporary authors," says Robertson, "agree in ascribing to Mary the utmost beauty of countenance and elegance of shape of which the human form is capable. Her hair was black, her eyes were a dark gray, her complexion was exquisitely fine, and her hands and arms remarkably delicate both as to shape and colour. Her stature was of a height that rose to the majestic."

Marzari-Pencati, mar-zä ree pĕn-kä'tee, (GIUSEPPE,) COUNT, an Italian mineralogist, born at Vicenza in 1777, discovered in 1810 the mine of fossil coal at Borgo di Valsugna. He invented an instrument for measuring angles, called "Tachigonimetro." Died in 1836.

Mar'zĭ-als, (THEOPHILE,) an English song-writer, born in Brussels, December 21, 1850. His father was a French (Gascon) Protestant pastor, and his mother was English. He was educated in Belgium, Switzerland, and England. In 1870 he obtained employment in the British Museum. He has published "The Gallery of Pigeons, and other Poems," (1873,) and many songs, ballads, rondeaux, etc. He has also composed music for many songs and ballads, and is a successful vocalist.

Masaccio Guidi da San Giovanni, mä-sät'cho goo-ee'dee dä sän jo-vän'nee, (TOMMASO,) an eminent Italian painter of the Florentine school, born near Florence in 1401 ranks first among the artists of the second or middle age of modern painting. His works were studied by Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Leonardo da Vinci. His figures are characterized by great animation and fidelity to nature and graceful arrangement of the draperies. He also excelled in perspective, which he learned under Brunelleschi. "Masaccio," says Fuseli, "was a genius, and the head of an epoch in the art. He may be considered as the precursor of Raphael, who imitated his principles and sometimes transcribed his figures." Among his most admired works are the frescos of San Pietro del Carmine at Florence, and the picture of "Christ Curing the Demoniacs." Masaccio died in 1443, and is generally supposed to have been poisoned.

Masaniello, mä-sä-ne-el'lo, or TOMMASO Aniello, born at Amalfi, in Italy, in 1622, was the son of a fisherman, and in 1647 became leader of a revolt against the Duke of Arcos, Spanish Viceroy of Naples. At the head of 50,000 insurgents, he compelled the duke to abolish a tax which he had imposed, and also to give up the charter of exemption granted to Naples by Charles V. The intoxication produced by this sudden change of fortune seems to have affected the reason of Masaniello, and, having by his conduct alienated his friends, he was soon after assassinated by the adherents of the viceroy.

Mascaron, mȧs'kȧ'rôN', (JULES,) an eminent French prelate and pulpit orator, born at Aix in 1634. He acquired a high reputation by his funeral oration on Anne of Austria, (1666,) and was soon after appointed preacher-in-ordinary to Louis XIV. He was created Bishop of Tulle in 1671, and of Agen in 1679. He is said to have converted many Calvinists in the latter diocese to Catholicism. He died in 1703, leaving all his property to the poor, to whom his virtues had greatly endeared him. A volume of his "Funeral Orations" was published in 1704. That on Marshal Turenne is eulogized by La Harpe as a master-piece.

Masch, mȧsh, (ANDREAS GOTTLIEB,) a German writer and theologian, born in Mecklenburg in 1724. He published, besides other works, "Contributions towards the History of Remarkable Books," (1769,) and an excellent edition of Lelong's "Bibliotheca Sacra." Died in 1807.

Mascheroni, mȧs-kȧ-ro'nee, (LORENZO,) an Italian mathematician, born near Bérgamo in 1750. He became professor of Greek at Pavía, and subsequently of geometry at Bérgamo. On the invasion of Italy by the French, he was elected a member of the legislative body in the Cisalpine Republic. He published "Researches on the Equilibrium of Vaults," (1785,) and other mathematical treatises of a high character, also a curious work called "The Geometry of the Compass," (1797,) and a number of poems. Died in Paris in 1800.

Masclef, mȧs'klĕf', (FRANÇOIS,) a French Orientalist, born at Amiens in 1662. He published a "Hebrew Grammar," ("Grammatica Hebraica,") in which he opposes the use of vowel-points. It is regarded as one of the best works of the kind. Died in 1728.

Masers de Latude, mȧ'zaiR' dẹh lȧ'tüd', (HENRI,) was born in Languedoc in 1725. Having given offence to Madame de Pompadour, he was by her orders imprisoned in the Bastille. After remaining captive nearly three years, he effected his escape, (1756,) with the assistance of a fellow-prisoner and by means of the most persevering toil. He was soon arrested, with his companion, D'Alègre, and, after suffering an imprisonment of thirty years, was at length released, by the efforts of Madame Legros, who interested Cardinal Rohan, Madame Necker, and others, in his behalf. His "Memoirs" were published by M. Thierry. Died in 1805.

See THIERRY, "Le Despotisme dévoilé, ou Mémoires de Latude," 3 vols., 1792.

Mash'am, (ABIGAIL HILL,) born in London about 1670, was a cousin of the celebrated Duchess of Marlborough, upon whose recommendation she became waiting-maid to the princess, afterwards Queen Anne. She continued in this post after Anne ascended the throne, and by her arts supplanted the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour. She was married in 1707 to Mr. Masham, who was made a peer in 1711. It appears that her influence raised Harley and the Tories to power in 1710, deprived the Duke of Marlborough of the command of the army, (1712,) and made important changes in the politics of Europe. In allusion to her intrigues, Macaulay says, "The great party which had long swayed the destinies of Europe was undermined by bedchamber-women." Died in 1734.

See MACAULAY'S Review of LORD MAHON'S "History of the War of the Succession."

Masham, (Lady DAMARIS,) the daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, born at Cambridge, England, in 1658, was married to Sir Francis Masham, of Essex. She was distinguished for her piety and for her attainments in history, philosophy, and divinity. She was a friend and pupil of the celebrated Locke, who died at her house, having resided there for some time. Lady Masham wrote several religious treatises. Died in 1708.

See LORD KING, "Life of Locke."

Mas-i-nis'sa, [Gr. Μασσανάσσης,] King of Numidia, the son of Gula, who reigned in Massylia, was born about 250 B.C. In the second Punic war he fought at first for the Carthaginians in Spain, but, having been generously treated by Scipio Africanus, he became a zealous and faithful ally of the Romans. He waged war with Syphax, a Numidian prince, and was defeated by him twice. The Romans under Scipio came to his assistance, and in 203 the allies gained a decisive victory. Among the captives was the charming Sophonisba, a Carthaginian lady, whom Masinissa married. Being sternly reproved by Scipio for this impolitic act, he sent her a cup of poison, which she drank, it is said, with heroic spirit. He contributed to the victory of the Romans at the battle of Zama, and was rewarded with the kingdom of Numidia. He is said to have been a wise ruler and to have done much to civilize his subjects. He died about the age of ninety-seven, leaving the kingdom, under the guardianship of Scipio Æmilianus, to his three sons, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal.

Mas'kęll, (WILLIAM,) an English author, born in Bath in 1814. He graduated in 1836 at University College, Oxford, was (1837–50) an Anglican clergyman, but on account of the famous Gorham controversy became in 1850 a Roman Catholic layman. He published a number of theological works, also "Ancient and Mediæval Ivories," (1872,) etc. Died April 12, 1890.

Mas'kę-lyne, (NEVIL,) an English astronomer of great merit, born in London in 1732. He was sent to Saint Helena in 1761 to observe the transit of Venus, in which enterprise he failed because the sun was obscured by clouds. In 1765 he succeeded Mr. Bliss as astronomer royal. He originated the "Nautical Almanack," (1767,) and superintended its publication till his death. It acquired a high reputation in Europe, and was styled by Lalande "the most perfect Ephemeris that had ever been made." For forty-seven years Maskelyne made exact observations of the sky at Greenwich, and was the first to give a standard catalogue of stars, (1790.) In 1772 he visited Scotland, in order to ascertain the density of the earth by observing the effect of the mountain Schehallien upon the plumb-line. He was the author of several astronomical treatises in the "Philosophical Transactions," and was a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was also a foreign associate of the Academy of Sciences in Paris. Died in 1811.

Mas-Latrie, de, dęh mä'lȧ'trę', (JACQUES MARIE JOSEPH LOUIS,) a French archæologist and historical writer, born at Castelnaudary in 1815. He published a "Historic Chronology of the Popes, General Councils," etc., (1837,) "History of the Isle of Cyprus under the Rule of the Princes of the House of Lusignan," (1852,) and "Chronicles of Ernoult and Bernard the Treasurer," (1872,) etc. Died January 5, 1897.

Maso da San Friano. See MANZUOLI.

Mā'sọn, (ALEXANDER MACOMB,) an American soldier, born at Washington city in 1841. He joined the navy, fought on the Confederate side in the civil war, afterwards served as a soldier in Chili, China, and Cuba, and in 1870 went to Egypt, where he became a favourite of the Khedive. He surveyed Lake Albert Nyanza, was made governor of equatorial Africa, served with General Gordon at Khartum in 1878, and in 1884 was appointed Governor of Massowah and high commissioner of the Soudan. Died in 1897.

Mā'sọn, (CHARLES,) an English astronomer, who assisted Dr. Bradley in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. He published an improved edition of Mayer's "Lunar Tables," and, in company with Mr. Dixon, was sent to America to determine the limits of Maryland and Pennsylvania. They measured a degree of the meridian, and in 1768 Dr. Maskelyne published an account of their operations in the "Philosophical Transactions" for that year. Died in 1787.

Mason, (FRANCIS,) D.D., a learned Baptist divine and missionary, born at York, England, in 1799. Having emigrated to America, he studied theology at Newton, Massachusetts, and sailed for India in 1830. He published a "Memoir of Mrs. Helen M. Mason," (1847,) "Burmah, its People and Natural Productions," (1852,) "Life of Kotha-byu, the Karen Apostle," a translation of the Bible into the Karen language, (1853,) and other works. He was also editor of a Karen journal, entitled "The Morning Star." He died March 3, 1874.

Mason, (GEORGE,) COLONEL, an English statesman and soldier under the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II., emigrated to America about 1654, and settled in Virginia. Died in 1686.

Mason, (GEORGE,) an American statesman, a descendant of the preceding, was born in Stafford county, now Fairfax county, Virginia, in 1726. He wrote the Declaration of Rights and the Constitution of Virginia, (1776,) after which he served in the legislature. In 1777 he was elected to the Continental Congress. He was reputed one of the ablest debaters that Virginia ever produced. He was a member of the national convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, but he refused to sign that Constitution, and vehemently opposed its adoption in the Virginia Assembly, for the alleged reason that it tended to monarchy. He was highly eulogized by Jefferson. Died in 1792.

Mason, (GEORGE,) an English littérateur, who wrote a "Life of Lord Howe," an "Answer to Thomas Paine," and an "Essay on Designs in Gardening." Died in 1806.

Mason, (GEORGE HEMMING,) an English artist, born at Whitley, in Staffordshire, in 1818. He studied medicine, but abandoned that profession for art, working mostly at Rome. His pictures are realistic presentations of homely and unambitious scenes, but, notwithstanding the fine poetic qualities of his works, they were not popular during his lifetime. Died October 22, 1872.

Mason, (JAMES,) a distinguished English engraver, born about 1710, executed a number of landscapes after Claude Lorrain, G. Poussin, Hobbema, and other artists. Died about 1780.

Mason, (JAMES MURRAY,) an American Democratic politician, born in Fairfax county, Virginia, about 1798. He became a member of Congress in 1837, and was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Virginia in 1847. He continued to be a member of the Senate for fourteen years, and was the author of the fugitive-slave law of 1850. He was sent with J. Slidell on a mission to England by Jefferson Davis in 1861. During the passage in the steamer Trent they were seized by Captain Wilkes, of the Federal navy, in November, 1861. They were claimed by the British government, and were liberated in January, 1862, after which Mr. Mason passed several years in England, remaining abroad during the civil war. Died in 1871.

Mason, (JEREMIAH,) an American statesman and lawyer of high reputation, born at Lebanon, Connecticut, in April, 1768, graduated at Yale College. He practised law many years at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to which he removed in 1797. He was a Federalist, and a friend of Daniel Webster, who expressed a very high opinion of him. He represented New Hampshire in the Senate of the United States from 1813 to 1817. In 1832 he removed to Boston, where he died in October, 1848. He was considered in the early part of the present century to be the foremost lawyer in New England.

Mason, (Sir JOHN,) an English statesman, born at Abingdon in 1500. He was privy councillor in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. Died in 1566.

Mason, (JOHN,) a native of England, born in 1600, emigrated to America, where he became Deputy Governor of Connecticut. He was the author of a "History of the Pequot War." Died in 1677.

See G. E. ELLIS, "Life of John Mason," in SPARKS's "American Biography," vol. iii., 2d series.

Mason, (JOHN,) an English divine and religious writer, born in Essex in 1706, was the author of a popular work, entitled "Self-Knowledge," (1745,) which was translated into several languages. Died in 1763.

Mason, (JOHN MITCHELL,) a celebrated American theologian and pulpit orator, born in New York in 1770. He graduated at Columbia College in 1789, and subsequently finished his theological studies in Edinburgh. In 1793 he succeeded his father as pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Cedar Street, New York, where he attracted great numbers by his eloquence. He was the founder of the first theological seminary in the United States, of which he was appointed professor. He became editor of the "Christian's Magazine" in 1807, and was elected in 1811 provost of Columbia College, and in 1821 president of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania. Among his most admired writings is his "Oration on the Death of Alexander Hamilton," who was his intimate friend. Dr. Mason died in 1829. His works (in 4 vols. were edited by his son, the Rev. Ebenezer Mason.

See "Memoirs of J. M. Mason," by J. VAN VECHTEN, 1856; DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature," vol. i: CLEVELAND, "Compendium of American Literature."

Mason, (JOHN THOMSON,) an American lawyer and statesman, son of Thomson Mason, noticed below, was born in Stafford county, Virginia, in 1764. He was a personal friend of Jefferson, who appointed him to several high offices. Died in 1824.

Mason, (JOHN Y.,) born in Sussex county, Virginia, about 1795, was secretary of the navy under President Tyler, and attorney-general and secretary of the navy (1846–49) under President Polk. He was afterwards appointed minister to France by President Pierce. Died in Paris in 1859.

Mason, (LOWELL,) an American composer and teacher of music, born at Medfield, Massachusetts, in 1792. He received the degree of doctor in music from the New York University in 1855. He was a contributor to the "Musical Review," and published numerous works on music, both original and compiled. Died August 11, 1872.

Mason, (OTIS TUFTON,) an American ethnologist, born at Eastport, Maine, in 1838. He graduated at Columbian University in 1861, and became curator of ethnology in the National Museum in 1884. He wrote "Woman's Share in Primitive Culture," "Origin of Inventions," "Primitive Transportation," "Cradles of the North American Indians," etc.

Mason, (RICHARD B.,) grandson of George Mason, noticed above, served with distinction in the Mexican war of 1848, and became civil and military Governor of California. Died in 1850.

Mason, (STEVENS THOMSON,) a nephew of George Mason, was born in Virginia in 1760. He served in the war of the Revolution, and was elected to the United States Senate in 1794. Died in 1803.

Mason, (STEVENS THOMSON,) grandson of the preceding, was born in Loudoun county, Virginia, in 1811. He was elected in 1835 first Governor of the State of Michigan. Died January 4, 1843.

Mason, (THOMSON,) younger brother of George Mason, noticed above, was born in 1730. He distinguished himself as a jurist and a patriot, and was the author of several able political essays. Died in 1785.

Mason, (WILLIAM,) an English poet, born at Hull in 1725. He was chosen a Fellow of Pembroke College in 1747, and, after taking orders, became chaplain to the king. Mason is chiefly remembered as the friend and biographer of the poet Gray. His principal works are two tragedies, entitled "Elfrida" and "Caractacus," several odes, and "The English Garden," a descriptive poem. He was also distinguished for his skill in painting and music. Died in 1797.

Masoodee Alee-Abool-Hassan, Mas'ûdî Alî-Abul-Hassan, or Masoudy Ali-Aboul-Hassan, mâ-soo'dee â'lee' â'bōōl' hâs'san, often called Al-Masoodee, (or Al-Mas'ûdî,) an eminent Arabian historian born at Bagdâd in the ninth century. His profound and various attainments in almost every department of knowledge have obtained for him the admiration of Europeans as well as of his own countrymen. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and as far west as Morocco and Spain. Among his most important works are his "History of the Times," and his "Meadows of Gold and Mines of Gems," the latter of which comprises the history, politics, religion, and geography of Eastern and European nations. Masoodee is supposed to have died at Cairo, in 956 A.D.

Masotti, mâ-sot'tee, (DOMENICO,) a distinguished Italian surgeon, born at Faenza in 1698, was appointed professor of physiology and surgery at Florence, and afterwards of lithotomy. In 1763 he published his principal work, entitled "Lithotomy for Women Perfected." Died in 1779.

Masoudi. See MASOODEE.

Maspero, mâs'pâ'rō', (GASTON CAMILLE CHARLES,) a French Egyptologist, born in Paris, June 24, 1846. He studied at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand and the École Normale, and in 1874 became professor of Egyptian archæology and philosophy in the Collége de France. He has published translations of various papyri, and many memoirs on archæological questions, besides "De Carchemis Situ et Historia," (1873,) "Histoire ancienne des Peuples de l'Orient," (1875,) and other works. His monumental work is "History of the Ancient Peoples of the Classic East," (1894–1900.)

Masque de Fer, mâsk dẹh fẽR, (L'Homme au, lom ō,) (the "Man with the Iron Mask,") an unknown person, who in 1662 was imprisoned in the château of Pignerol, afterwards conveyed to the isle of Sainte-Marguerite, and in 1698 to the Bastille, where he died in 1703. Various conjectures have been formed concerning this mysterious prisoner, who was evidently a person of high rank and refined tastes. Some writers have supposed him to have been a twin brother of Louis XIV.; others, that he was the Count of Vermandois, the Duke of Beaufort, or Count Mattioli.

Masquelier, mâsk'le-â', (LOUIS JOSEPH,) a French engraver, born near Lille in 1741. In 1802 he obtained from the gallery of Florence a gold medal for his engravings. Died in 1811.

Massa, mâs'sâ, (NICCOLÒ,) an Italian physician and medical writer, born at Venice; died about 1563.

Massard, mâ'sâR', (JEAN,) a French engraver, born at Bellême in 1740. He became a member of the Academy of Painting in the reign of Louis XVI., and, on the restoration of the Bourbons, was made, in 1814, engraver to the king. His most admired works are "The Family of Charles I.," after Van Dyck, and "The Death of Socrates," after David. Died in 1822.

Massard, (JEAN BAPTISTE RAPHAEL URBAIN,) a skilful French engraver, son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1775. He engraved some works of Raphael, Giulio Romano, and David. Died in 1849.

Massaredo. See MAZARREDO Y SALAZAR.

Massari, mâs-sâ'ree, (LUCIO,) an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1569, was a pupil of Ludovico Caracci. He was intimate with Albano, and took part in some of his labours. Among his master-pieces are the "Marriage of Saint Catherine," and a "Noli me Tangere." "Some of his works," says E. Breton, "are so graceful that they defy the severest criticism." Died in 1633.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie;" MALVASIA, "Felsina pittrice."

Massaria, mâs-sâ-ree'â, (ALESSANDRO,) a learned Italian physician, born at Vicenza about 1510. He studied under Fracantianus and Fallopius, and in 1587 succeeded Mercuriale as professor of medicine in the University of Padua. He was the author of a "Treatise on the Plague" and a "Treatise on Bleeding," which are highly esteemed. Died in 1598.

See PORTAL, "Histoire de l'Anatomie."

Mas'sa-soit, an Indian chief of the Womponoags, born in Massachusetts. In 1621 he formed a league with the colonists at Plymouth, which was never violated. He was the father of the celebrated warrior King Philip. Died in 1661.

Massé, mâ'sâ', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French artist, born in Paris in 1687, engraved the pictures which Lebrun had executed for the gallery of Versailles. Massé became painter to Louis XV. Died in 1767.

Massé, mâ'sâ', (VICTOR,) a French musical composer, born at Lorient, March 7, 1822. He was educated at the Paris Conservatory, taking the prix de Rome in 1844. His first work for the stage, the operetta of "La Chanteuse voilée," (1852,) was at once successful, and he followed it up with a large number of pieces for the stage. The best-known of these are "Galatea," "The Seasons," and "Paul and Virginia." The last is the only one of his operas well known in this country. Died July 6, 1884.

Masséna, mâ'sâ'nâ', [It. MASSENA, mâs-sā'nâ,] (AN-DRÉ,) Prince of Essling, Duke of Rivoli, and one of the most distinguished marshals of Napoleon I., was born of Jewish parentage at Nice in 1758. He enlisted in 1775 as a private of the royal Italian regiment, from which he retired at the expiration of fourteen years, having attained no higher rank than that of a sergeant. At the beginning of the French Revolution he again entered the army, and in a short time was successively promoted to the rank of colonel, general of brigade, and general of division. In 1794 he gained a victory over the Austrians near Tanaro, took Ormea, and rendered efficient service at the battle of Saorgio. The following year, while serving under General Schérer, he drove the Austrians from their position at Vado and gained over them the decisive victory of Loano. In 1796 he acquired great distinction at the engagements of Montenotte, Millesimo, Castiglione, and Arcola. His gallant conduct at the battle of Rivoli, in 1797, subsequently procured for him the title of Duke of Rivoli. The next year he was appointed to the command of the army in the Papal States; but his rapacity and avarice excited so great hostility both in his soldiers and in the inhabitants that he was soon after compelled to resign. In 1799, as commander-in-chief of the armies of Switzerland and the Danube, he exhibited the highest order of military talent, especially at Zurich, where he gained an important and brilliant victory over the Russians. In 1804 he was created a marshal of France. The next year he was sent to Italy, to command against the Archduke Charles, whom he finally succeeded in driving back into Germany. In 1806 he reduced the insurgent Calabrians to subjection, took the fortress of Gaëta, and enabled Joseph Bonaparte to seat himself firmly upon the Neapolitan throne. He reaped further laurels in 1809, at the battles of Landshut and Eckmühl and by the capture of the fortress of Ebersdorf. The same year he was created Prince of Essling, for his distinguished services at the battle of that place. Masséna was appointed in 1810 general-in-chief of the army in Portugal, where, although he exhibited his usual courage and military skill, he was ultimately obliged to yield to the superior genius of Sir Arthur Wellesley. He has, however, received the highest commendation from English as well as French historians for the strategic skill with which he conducted his retreat into Spain. In 1812 Marmont was appointed to succeed him. The year following, Masséna joined the Bourbons. He acknowledged the authority of Napoleon when he returned from Elba, but took no part in the affairs of government during the Hundred Days. He was subsequently appointed commander-in-chief of the National Guard in Paris, and also received several marks of distinction from Louis XVIII. He died in Paris, April 4, 1817.

Massenbach, von, fon mȧs'sẹn-bȧK', (CHRISTIAN,) a Prussian officer, born at Schmalkalden in 1768. He published several historical works. Died in 1827.

Massenet, mȧs'sẹh'nȧ', (JULES ÉMILE FRÉDÉRIC,) a French composer, born at Montaud, May 12, 1842. He was educated at the Paris Conservatoire, where he became professor of composition. Among his operas are "Poème d'Avril," "Scènes hongroises," "Marie-Madeleine," "Eve," a mystery, "Le Roi de Lahore," "La Hérodiade," "Manon Lescaut," etc.

Mas'sey, (GERALD,) an English poet, born in Hertfordshire in 1828. The child of indigent parents, he was obliged at an early age to work in a factory, and received no other instruction than that of a penny school. He published in 1847 "Poems and Chansons," which were followed in 1853 by "The Ballad of Babe Christabel, with other Lyrical Poems," "A Tale of Eternity, and other Poems," (1870,) etc. He also won some distinction as a lecturer.

Massiac, de, deh mȧ'se'ȧK', (GABRIEL,) a French officer and historical writer, born at Narbonne in 1657. He wrote "Memoirs of the Most Important Events of the War from 1688 to 1698." Died in 1727.

Massias, mȧ'se'ȧs', (NICOLAS,) BARON, a French littérateur, born at Villeneuve d'Agen in 1764. Among his philosophical works is an "Essay on Instinct, Intelligence, and Life," (4 vols., 1822.) Died in 1848.

Massie, mas'se, (NATHANIEL,) an American soldier and pioneer, born in Goochland county, Virginia, in 1763, settled in Ohio, where he became one of the largest landowners in the State. He founded in 1796 the town of Chilicothe. Died in 1813.

Massieu, mȧ'se-uh', (GUILLAUME,) a French littérateur, born at Caen in 1665. He was appointed in 1710 professor of Greek in the College of France. He translated the Odes of Pindar, and wrote a "History of French Poetry," brought down to the reign of Francis I. Died in 1722.

Massieu, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French ecclesiastic, born in Picardy, became constitutional Bishop of L'Oise in 1791. He voted for the death of Louis XVI. in the National Convention. Died in 1818.

Massillon, mȧ'sẹl'yȯN' or mȧ'se'yȯN', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French pulpit orator of great celebrity, born at Hières, in Provence, in 1663. He was educated in the college of that town, and became a priest of the Oratory. After professing belles-lettres and theology at Montbrison and Vienne, and pronouncing some funeral orations, he was called to Paris in 1696 to direct the Seminary of Saint-Magloire. His talent was gradually developed by the ecclesiastic conferences which he composed at this period. He admired the austere eloquence of Bourdaloue, but chose for himself a different style, characterized by profound pathos and an insight into the most secret motives of the human heart. In 1699 he preached at Paris the Lent sermon, which was warmly applauded. The same year he was chosen to preach the Advent at court, on which occasion Louis XIV. said to him, "I have heard many great orators and been pleased with them; but after hearing you I am displeased with myself." The death of Bossuet and Bourdaloue, in 1704, left him at the head of French pulpit orators. In this year he again preached before Louis XIV., whose funeral oration he pronounced in 1715. He was appointed Bishop of Clermont in 1717, and preached before the young king the Lent sermon called "Petit-Carême," which is esteemed his master-piece. His diction is noble, simple, and unaffected. Voltaire kept a volume of his sermons constantly on his desk, as a model of eloquence. Massillon was admitted into the French Academy in 1719. In the government of his diocese he was moderate, charitable, and conciliatory. He died in 1742. His published works consist of Sermons, Ecclesiastical Conferences, Paraphrases of certain Psalms, Letters, etc. Voltaire thought him "the preacher who best understood the world,—whose eloquence savoured of the courtier, the academician, the wit, and the philosopher."

Mas'sin-ger, (PHILIP,) an eminent English dramatic poet, was born at Salisbury in 1584. In his eighteenth year he entered Saint Alban's Hall, Oxford, supported by the Earl of Pembroke. Here, according to Anthony Wood, "he spent his time in reading poetry and romances instead of logic and philosophy, which he ought to have done, as he was patronized to that end." He became a resident of London about 1606, and assisted Fletcher in the composition of several dramas. The first production of Massinger was the "Virgin Martyr," (1622.) Eighteen of his dramas are extant, mostly tragedies and tragi-comedies. Among the most admired are "The City Madam," "The Maid of Honour," "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," and "The Fatal Dowry." The latter has given to Rowe the outline of the "Fair Penitent." Massinger's dramas are remarkably free from profanity; and the coarseness which disfigures some of them is probably to be attributed to his coadjutors. He is said to have been the only dramatist of that time who rejected the doctrine of the divine right of kings. Died in 1640.

Massmann, mâs'mân, (HANS FERDINAND,) a German scholar, born at Berlin in 1797. He published an edition of the "Explanation of the Gospel of Saint John" in Gothic. Died August 3, 1874.

Massolino, da, dâ mâs-so-lee'no, (PANICALE, pâ-nekâ'lâ,) an Italian painter, born near Florence in 1378. His master-pieces are the pictures in the chapel of San Pietro al Carmine, representing leading incidents in the life of Saint Peter. He numbered among his pupils the celebrated Masaccio. Died in 1415.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.

Masson. See LATOMUS.

Masson, mâ'sôn', (ANTOINE,) a French engraver, born near Orléans in 1636. He excelled particularly in representing colour and the different textures of objects. His print of the "Disciples at Emmaus," after Titian, is esteemed one of his master-pieces, though not free from a fantastic style of executing the hair, peculiar to himself. Masson was also a painter, and his engravings from his own portraits, as well as from those of other artists, are greatly admired, many of them representing the most distinguished men of that time. He was engraver-in-ordinary to the king. Died in 1702.

His daughter, MADELÈNE MASSON, born in 1666, was a skilful imitator of her father's style, and executed the portraits of Maria Theresa, the Duchess d'Alençon, and several others.

Math'ẹr, (COTTON,) D.D., a celebrated American theologian and writer, born at Boston in 1663, was a son of Increase Mather, noticed below. He was ordained as a minister in 1684, and preached in Boston. Among his principal works are "The Wonders of the Invisible World," (1693,) "Magnalia Christi Americana, or The Ecclesiastical History of New England," (1702,) "Essays to do Good," (1710,) "Psalterium Americanum," (1718,) "The Christian Philosopher," (1721,) and "Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," (in manuscript.) His character exhibits a remarkable compound of ardent piety, (which, however, was not without a tincture of self-conceit,) uncommon activity, and force of intellect joined to a credulity which, even in that age, had scarcely any parallel among educated men. From the first he was eager to bring to trial and punishment those supposed to be guilty of witchcraft, and, when others began clearly to see the folly and injustice of these cruel persecutions, he earnestly, though vainly, strove to stem the reaction in the popular mind. Died in 1728.

Mather, (INCREASE,) son of Richard Mather, a nonconformist divine who removed from Lancashire to New England, was born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1635. He was sent about 1685 to England as agent of the province for the redress of grievances. He published, among other works, an "Essay on Remarkable Providences." Died in 1723.

She was married in 1110 to Henry V. of Germany, who died in 1125. About 1127 she became the wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou, and was recognized by her father as his successor. On the death of Henry (1135) her title was disputed by Stephen of Blois, and a long civil war ensued between them. Matilda prevailed in 1141, and was crowned in London. She was the mother of Henry II. Died in 1167.

See MATTHEW PARIS, "Historia major."

Matilda, daughter of Boniface III., Marquis of Tuscany, was born about 1046. She was first married to Godfrey le Bossu, son of the Duke of Lorraine. He died in 1076, and, her mother having died the same year, Matilda came into possession of her vast estates, including the greater part of Northern Italy. In the contest for supremacy between Pope Gregory VII. and the Emperor of Germany, she espoused with great zeal the cause of the former; and it was at her castle of Canossa that Henry IV. underwent the humiliating penance imposed by the pope. In 1077 she made a reversionary grant of all her dominions to the Church of Rome. She was married in 1089 to Guelph, Duke of Bavaria, from whom she was divorced in 1095. Died in 1115.

Matthias, mȧ-thī'ȧss, [Ger. pron. mät-tee'âss; It. MATTIA, mät-tee'ȧ,] Emperor of Germany, born in 1557, was the son of Maximilian II. and Mary, daughter of Charles V. He was invited in 1578, by the Catholics of the Netherlands, to assume the government of that country, which office he soon resigned. He was appointed Stadtholder of Austria in 1595, and in 1611 was invited by the Bohemians to become their ruler. On the death of his brother Rudolf, Emperor of Germany, in 1612, Matthias succeeded to the throne. In the ensuing contest between the Protestant and Catholic factions he pursued a vacillating policy, and while striving to direct made himself distrusted by both. He concluded a disadvantageous treaty with the Turks, then in possession of Hungary, (1615,) and soon after caused his cousin Ferdinand to be proclaimed King of Bohemia and Hungary. (See FERDINAND II.) Matthias died in 1619, in the midst of the dissensions which preceded the Thirty Years' war.

Maurice, mau'riss, [Ger. MO'RITZ; Lat. MAURI'TIUS,] Elector of Saxony, a celebrated general and champion of the Protestant cause, was born at Freiberg, March 21, 1521. He succeeded his father, Henry, Duke of Saxony, in 1541, and married Agnes, a daughter of Philip, Landgrave of Hesse. In 1546 he formed a secret alliance with the emperor Charles V. against the Protestant League of Schmalkalden, with a design to supplant John Frederick as Elector of Saxony, whose dominions he invaded with success. The title of elector was transferred to him by Charles V. In consequence of his unexpected hostility to the Protestants, the Imperial army gained a decisive victory at Mühlberg in April, 1547, and the Protestant cause was apparently ruined. Having changed his policy, and formed, in 1551, a secret treaty with Henry II. of France, Maurice, aided by several German princes, in the spring of 1552 took arms for the assertion of religious liberty, and marched against Charles V., who was at Innspruck. Surprised by this sudden movement, Charles was compelled to retreat, the Council of Trent was dispersed in confusion, and hostilities were terminated by the memorable treaty of Passau, August 22, 1552, which secured religious liberty to the Protestants of Germany. Maurice was killed in a battle against Albert of Brandenburg, at Sievershausen, in July, 1553.

Mau'rus Terentia'nus, (te-rĕn-she-ā'nus,) a Latin writer, supposed to have been a native of Carthage, was the author of a poem on the rules of Latin versification, entitled "De Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus," etc.

Maury, mō're', (JEAN SIFFREIN,) a celebrated French prelate and pulpit orator, born in the Venaissin in 1746.

He repaired to Paris about 1766, and soon acquired a high reputation by his "Funeral Oration on the Dauphin," and his "Eulogy of Fénelon." He published in 1777 his "Treatise on Pulpit Eloquence," and in 1778 was appointed to preach the Carême (Lent) sermon before the king. His "Panegyric on Saint Vincent de Paul," which is esteemed his master-piece, appeared in 1785, and he was soon after chosen a member of the French Academy. In 1789 he was a deputy of the clergy of Péronne to the States-General, where he was conspicuous as the eloquent advocate of the Church and of the royalist party and the most powerful opponent of Mirabeau. On the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly he was obliged to leave the country, and at the invitation of Pius VI. he took up his residence at Rome, where he was made a cardinal in 1794. In 1804 he wrote a letter of congratulation to the emperor Napoleon, and henceforth attached himself to the interests of the new sovereign. He was successively created by him a member of the Institute, first almoner of Jerome Bonaparte, and Archbishop of Paris, (1810.) After the restoration of the Bourbons, Cardinal Maury was deprived of his place, and retired to Rome, where he died in 1817. Maury was noted for his brilliant repartee, of which the following instances may be given. Being asked by Napoleon how he stood with regard to the Bourbons, he replied, "Sire, my respect for them is unalterable; but I have lost faith and hope, and there remains to me only charity." Once, in the Assembly, some ladies of rank, known for their republican opinions, attempted by their loud conversation to drown his voice, when, turning to the president, he said, "I pray you silence those Sans-culottes."

Maury, mŏw-ree', (JUAN MARIA,) a Spanish poet and critic, born at Malaga, published in 1826 a collection of Spanish lyrics, entitled "Poetical Spain," ("Espagne poétique,") which were translated into elegant French verse and accompanied with critical and biographical notices. Died in 1845.

Maury, (LOUIS FERDINAND ALFRED,) a French antiquarian writer, born at Meaux in 1817. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1857. He published a number of works, the most valuable of which is his "History of the Religions of Ancient Greece," (3 vols., 1857.) Died at Paris, February 11, 1892.

Mau'rў, (MATTHEW FONTAINE,) LL.D., an American hydrographer and naval officer, born in Spottsylvania county, Virginia, in 1806. About 1826 he sailed in the Vincennes on a voyage around the world, and after his return was made a lieutenant in 1836. He published a "Treatise on Navigation," (about 1835,) "Letters on the Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America," "Relation between Magnetism and the Circulation of the Atmosphere," "Astronomical Observations," (1853,) and "Physical Geography of the Sea," (1855; sixth edition, 1856,) a work which has been highly praised by competent judges. Died February 1, 1873.

See the "North British Review" for May, 1858.

Mau-so'lus, [Gr. Μαύσωλος; Fr. MAUSOLE, mō'zol',] son of Hecatomnus, became King of Caria, in Asia Minor, about 377 B.C., being, however, nominally a satrap of the Persian empire. He made considerable conquests in Persia and in different parts of Greece, and was, according to Demosthenes, one of the instigators of the Social war. From his name is derived the word "mausoleum." The colossal statue of Mausolus, now in the British Museum, is one of the finest extant relics of ancient art. (See ARTEMISIA.)

Mavrocordatos, mâv-ro-kor-dā'tos, or Mavrocordato, mâv-ro-kor-dā'to, (ALEXANDER,) a modern Greek physician, statesman, and scholar, born about 1636. He studied at Rome and Padua, and took his medical degree at Bologna. Having settled at Constantinople, his profound knowledge of both Oriental and European languages procured for him the post of grand dragoman to the Ottoman Porte, (1673.) He was afterwards employed in important embassies to Vienna, and negotiated the treaty of Carlowitz, (1698.) His services to Austria on this occasion were rewarded by the emperor Leopold with the title of count of the empire, while he was appointed secretary of state by the Sultan, and obtained other distinctions. He was the author of a medical work entitled "Pneumaticum Instrumentum," etc., which was translated into French, German, and Spanish, a "Modern Greek Grammar," and a collection of letters. Died in 1709.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mavrocordatos, (ALEXANDER,) a Greek statesman, born at Constantinople in 1791. He took arms against the Turks in 1821, and was appointed president of the executive committee in January, 1822, soon after which he took command of the army. Having been rendered almost powerless by the dissensions among the Greeks and by the enmity of Colocotronis and Ypsilanti, he resigned or refused the office of president in 1823. In 1832 he was appointed a member of the cabinet by King Otho, whom he served as ambassador to Munich, Berlin, and London between 1834 and 1840. He was prime minister for a short time in 1841, and president of the council in 1844. About May, 1854, he was restored to power, which he resigned a few months later. Died in 1865.

Mavrocordatos, (NICHOLAS,) son of Alexander, (the first of the name,) was appointed successively dragoman to the Sultan, Hospodar of Moldavia (1709) and of Wallachia, (1711.) Died in 1730.

Mavromichalis, mav-ro-me-kȧ'lis, known also as PIETRO BEY, a modern Greek patriot, born in the Morea about 1775. He fought against the Turks in the revolution which began in 1821, and became a member of the provisional government. Died in 1848.

Mawe, maw, (JOSEPH,) an English naturalist, born in Derbyshire in 1764, published "Travels in the Interior of Brazil," etc., (1812,) "Treatise on Diamonds and Precious Stones," (1813,) "Mineralogy of Derbyshire," and other scientific treatises. Died in 1829.

Mawmoisine, maw'moi-zin, or Malvoisine, de, dẹh mȧl'vo-zin, (WILLIAM,) a prelate, supposed to have been a native of France. Having visited Scotland, he was made Bishop of Saint Andrew's in 1202. He established many monasteries in that country, and was active in promoting a crusade to the Holy Land.

Maxentius, maks-ẽn'shẹ-us, [Fr. MAXENCE, mȧk'sôNss',] (MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS,) a Roman emperor, was the son of Maximian, who abdicated in 305 A.D. He married the daughter of the emperor Galerius. He thought himself slighted by the promotion of Constantine to the rank of Cæsar in 306, and excited a revolt among the Prætorian guards, who proclaimed him emperor at Rome in the same year. Galerius, who was then in a distant province, sent against him an army under Severus, who was defeated and killed by the aid of Maximian. Maxentius and his father reigned together for a short time, and made an alliance with Constantine, who married Fausta, a sister of Maxentius. Maximian was expelled from Rome in 308, in consequence of a quarrel with his son. In 312 the army of Constantine defeated that of Maxentius, who, in the retreat, was drowned in the Tiber.

Max-im'ĭ-an, [Fr. MAXIMIEN, mȧk'se'me-ȧN'; Lat. MAXIMIA'NUS,] or, more fully, Mar'cus Vale'rius Maximia'nus, a Roman emperor, born in Pannonia, was the son of a peasant. He had obtained high rank in the army when Diocletian, in 286 A.D., adopted him as his colleague in the empire. In the division of the empire, Italy and Africa were assigned to Maximian. In 305 Diocletian and Maximian formally abdicated in favour of Galerius and Constantius Chlorus. The next year he joined his son Maxentius in an effort to recover power, and was proclaimed emperor. In the war that ensued between him and Constantine he was taken prisoner, and executed in 310. (See MAXENTIUS.)

Max-ĭ-mil'ĭ-an [Ger. pron. mȧk-se-mee'le-ȧn; Fr. MAXIMILIEN, mȧk'se'me'le'ȧN'; Lat. MAXIMILIA'NUS; It. MASSIMILIANO, mȧs-se-me-le-ȧ'no] I., Emperor of Germany, born at Neustadt in 1459, was the son of Frederick III. and Leonora of Portugal. He married, in 1477, Mary of Burgundy, daughter and heiress of Charles the Bold, who died in 1482, leaving two children, Philip and Margaret. In accordance with the stipulations of the peace of Arras, (1482,) he betrothed his daughter Margaret to the Dauphin, (afterwards Charles VIII. of France,) with Burgundy, Artois, and Flanders for her portion. For several years following he was involved in a contest with France, and with his subjects in the Netherlands, incited to revolt by Louis XI. About 1492 he prepared to make war on Charles VIII., who not only refused to keep his engagement with Maximilian's daughter, but had deprived him of his intended bride, Anne, the wealthy heiress of Brittany. By the mediation of Philip, Elector of the Palatinate, a treaty of peace was concluded between the two sovereigns at Senlis, (1493,) by which Charles was compelled to give up the dowry of the princess. Maximilian was crowned Emperor of Germany, and in 1494 married Bianca Sforza, daughter of the Duke of Milan, which alliance gave rise to a succession of wars in Italy. He soon after joined the League of Cambray, formed between Pope Julius II., Ferdinand of Spain, and Louis XII. of France, against the Venetians; but, that republic having soon after become reconciled to the pope, Maximilian joined the so-called Holy League between England, Spain, Venice, and the pope, in opposition to the French, who were signally defeated by the forces of Henry VIII. and the emperor, in the "battle of the spurs," near Guinegate, (1513.) Francis I., having succeeded to the throne of France, captured Milan, and compelled Maximilian to give up Verona to the Venetians for 200,000 ducats. By the treaty of Bâle (1499) he had been obliged to acknowledge the independence of Switzerland. Though often unsuccessful in his wars, he had the fortune to acquire extensive territories by the marriage of his son Philip with the Infanta of Spain, and of his grandchildren Ferdinand and Maria with the son and daughter of Ladislaus, King of Hungary and Bohemia. His daughter Margaret was married to the Spanish prince Don Juan, a son of Ferdinand and Isabella. Among the important acts of his reign were the establishment of the Imperial Chamber and Aulic Council, and the abolition of the Secret Tribunal of Westphalia; he also created a standing army and introduced military discipline. He was a liberal patron of learned men, and was the author of several works in prose and verse. He died in January, 1519, and was succeeded by his grandson, Charles V.

Maximilian II., born in 1527, was the son of Ferdinand I., whom he succeeded in 1564 as Emperor of Germany. He was soon after engaged in a war with the Turks, who had established themselves in Hungary. After the death of Solyman II. a truce of eight years was concluded between his successor and the emperor Maximilian was favourably inclined towards the Protestants, whom he allowed to fill important offices; but the influence of the pope, the King of Spain, and the Catholic princes of Germany prevented him from formally embracing their doctrines. He died in 1576, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Rudolph.

Maximilian I., Elector of Bavaria, born in 1573. On the formation by the Protestants of the confederacy called the Union, (1608,) Maximilian put himself at the head of the opposing Catholic faction of the League. In conjunction with the emperor Ferdinand II., he fought in the Thirty Years' war against the Palatine Frederick V., and conquered the Upper and Lower Palatinate. In 1623 he obtained the electoral dignity of the Palatinate and the hereditary domains of Frederick V. Maximilian was an able ruler, and founded a number of colleges and other useful institutions. Died in 1651.

See KARL MARIA VON ARETIN, "Geschichte des Herzogs und Kurfürsten Maximilian I.," 1842.

Maximilian II., (JOSEPH,) King of Bavaria, the eldest son of King Lewis, was born in 1811. He married in 1842 a daughter of Prince Frederick William of Prussia. In March, 1848, he succeeded his father, who abdicated the throne. He opposed the project to unite the German peoples into one nation or confederacy of which the King of Prussia should be the head. He died in March, 1864, and was succeeded by his son Lewis.

Maximilian, (FERDINAND JOSEPH,) Emperor of Mexico and Archduke of Austria, born in July, 1832, was a brother of the emperor Francis Joseph. He married Carlotta, or Charlotte, a daughter of Leopold, King of Belgium, about 1858. In 1859 he was appointed an admiral and commander-in-chief of the Austrian navy. In 1863 he was tempted by Napoleon III. to act the part of emperor in Mexico, then partly conquered by the French and partly governed by the republican President Juarez. He arrived at the Mexican capital in June, 1864. He issued a decree that all who adhered to the republic or resisted his authority should be shot. Many prisoners, including General Orteaga, accordingly suffered death by his order. According to the New York "Evening Post," July 1, 1867, he ordered the enslavement of the whole labouring population of Mexico. The United States refused to recognize him as emperor, and required Napoleon to withdraw his army. Maximilian was much embarrassed by the want of money, and offended the clerical party (which had favoured him) by refusing to restore the property of the Church, which had been confiscated by the Liberals. The French troops departed about the end of 1866, after which the republicans gained several victories and the empire quickly collapsed. Maximilian was captured at Quéretaro in May, and shot on the 19th of June, 1867.

Maximilian, (ALEXANDER PHILIPP,) Prince of Neuwied, a German naturalist and traveller, born at Neuwied in 1782. In 1815 he set out on a journey through Brazil, where he spent two years and made a rich collection of specimens. On his return he published his "Travels in Brazil" and a "Description of the Natural History of Brazil." In 1833 he visited the western part of the United States. His "Journey through North America," a magnificent work, illustrated with eighty-one engravings, came out in 1843, and is said to be superior to anything of the kind that had hitherto appeared in Germany. Died in 1867.

Maximilian Joseph, "Duke in Bavaria," a German prince and author, the head of the ducal line of the Bavarian royal family, was born at Bamberg, December 4, 1808, and became a general of cavalry in the Bavarian army. He published "Wanderung nach Orient," "Novellen," "Skizzenbuch," etc., and compiled a collection of Bavarian popular songs and melodies. One of his daughters became Empress of Austria. Died in 1888.

Maximil'ian Mari'a Eman'uel, Elector of Bavaria, born in 1662, was a grandson of Maximilian I. In 1685 he married Maria Antonia, daughter of the emperor Leopold I., and was appointed in 1692 Governor of the Netherlands. Having taken part with the French in the war of the Spanish succession, he delivered up to them the Spanish Netherlands. After his defeat at the battle of Schellenberg, he was obliged by the emperor to give up his possessions, which, however, were restored at the peace of Baden in 1714. Died in 1726.

Max'I-min, [Lat. MAXIMI'NUS; Fr. MAXIMIN, mȧk'sē'mȧN',] or, more fully, Cai'us Ju'lius Ve'rus Maximi'nus, a native of Thrace, born in 173 A.D., served in the Roman army under Septimius Severus. Having followed Alexander Severus in his German campaign, he caused him to be assassinated, A.D. 235, and was proclaimed emperor in his stead. In consequence of his cruelties, the province of Africa soon after revolted, and Gordianus was made emperor by the senate of Rome, A.D. 237. Maximinus, having defeated and slain Gordianus, laid siege to Aquileia, during which he was killed in a mutiny of his soldiers, together with his son, in 238 A.D. If we may trust the concurrent testimony of ancient writers, Maximin was above eight feet high, well proportioned, and of such strength that he could easily draw a loaded wagon, and with a kick break the leg of a horse. He is said to have used his wife's bracelet for a finger-ring.

See TILLEMONT, "Histoire des Empereurs."

Max-I-mi'nus Dā'zą, an Illyrian peasant, a relative of Galerius, was raised by him to the dignity of Cæsar, A.D. 305. He ruled over Syria and Egypt, and persecuted the Christians. On the death of Galerius, in 311, Maximinus took possession of all the Asiatic provinces. He afterwards made war on Licinius, but was defeated, and died by poison at Tarsus in 313 A.D.

Max'I-mus, [Fr. MAXIME, mȧk'sėm'; It. MASSIMO, mȧs'se-mo,] (MAGNUS CLEMENS,) a usurper of the Roman empire, was a native of Spain. Having for several years commanded the Roman army in Britain with success, he revolted against Gratian about 381 A.D., and was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers. He then invaded Gaul to offer battle to Gratian, who was defeated, or fled without fighting, and was killed in 383. Theodosius and Valentinian recognized him as Emperor of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. Attempting to obtain Italy also by conquest, he was defeated by Theodosius, taken prisoner, and executed in 388 A.D.

See LE BEAU, "Histoire du Bas-Empire;" TILLEMONT, "Histoire des Empereurs."

Maximus, [Fr. MAXIME, mȧk'sėm',] SAINT, surnamed THE CONFESSOR and THE MONK, an eminent Greek theologian, born at Constantinople about 580 A.D. He zealously opposed the heresy of the Monothelites, and wrote many works on theology, which were highly esteemed in the middle ages. Died in 662 A.D.

Max'I-mus THE GREEK, a native of Albania, was invited to Russia by the grand duke Vassili Ivanovitch, in order to examine numerous Greek manuscripts recently discovered. He made translations of the principal ones into Latin, which were rendered by others into Slavonian. At the request of the Czar, he undertook to revise the early translations of the books of the Greek Church; but the numerous corrections which he made gave great offence, and he was excommunicated as a heretic in 1525. Died in 1556.

He has made many life-size genre pictures and portraits, and in 1869 was created a chevalier of the legion of honour. Among his best works are "Consolation," "Recognition," "Good Words," "Love's Melancholy," "The Sewing-School," "The Song of the Shirt," etc.

Mayer, (JOHANN CHRISTOPH ANDREAS,) a German anatomist, born at Greifswalde in 1747, became physician to the King of Prussia in 1789. Died in 1801.

Mayer, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German divine and polemist, born at Leipsic in 1650. He held professorships of divinity at Wittenberg, Kiel, and Greifswalde. He published over three hundred and seventy books and pamphlets, and was noted for his extreme hostility to Spener and the Pietists. His works are nearly forgotten. Died at Stettin in 1712.

Mayer, (JULIUS ROBERT,) a German physicist, born at Heilbronn, November 25, 1814. He was educated at Tübingen, Munich, and Paris, and became a surgeon at Heilbronn. He was distinguished as an able theorist on thermodynamics. His principal work is "Die Mechanik der Wärme," (1867.) Died March 20, 1878.

Mayer, mī'ẹr, [Lat. MAYE'RUS,] (JOHANN TOBIAS,) an eminent German mathematician and astronomer, born at Marbach in 1723. At an early age he devoted himself to the study of the exact sciences, and in 1750 became professor of mathematics in the University of Göttingen, and the next year director of the observatory in that place. In 1755 he published his "Lunar Tables," a work of the greatest accuracy and which at once gained him a high reputation. Among his many able productions we may name the "Zodiacal Catalogue," a treatise "On the Libration of the Moon," "Solar Tables," and "Terrestrial Refractions." Mayer also discovered the principle of the repeating circle, since developed by Borda and employed by him to measure the arc of the meridian. After Mayer's death, which took place in 1762, the British Parliament, at the suggestion of the board of longitude, paid to his widow the sum of £3000, being the prize offered for the "Lunar Tables."

Mayer or Mayr, mīr, (SIMON,) a celebrated German composer, born at Mendorf, in Bavaria, in 1763. He studied under Lenzi and Bertoni in Italy, and in 1802 became chapel-master at Bérgamo. He composed a great number of operas, among the most popular of which are his "Medea," "Lodoiska," and "Music-Mad," ("Il Fanatico per la Musica.") Died in 1845.

Mayerne-Turquet, de, (THÉODORE,) born, of French parentage, at Geneva in 1573, became physician-in-ordinary to Henry IV. of France. In 1611 he was appointed first physician to James I. of England, and held the same office under Charles I. He was the author of several valuable medical works in Latin. Died in 1655.

He also assisted Henry and Horace Mayhew in producing the "Brothers Mayhew" series of humorous tales. Died December 25, 1875. EDWARD MAYHEW, (born in London in 1813,) a brother of the above, was a theatrical manager, and the author of some farces, and of a series of illustrated and humorously-written books on veterinary practice. These had a wide sale in America and England. HORACE, another brother, was associated in the authorship of the "Brothers Mayhew" series, and wrote several comic books of his own. He was born in London in 1819, and died April 30, 1872. THOMAS, the eldest of the five brothers, was born in 1810, and published the "Penny National Library," including a "Penny Dictionary," "Penny Grammar," etc. He was also editor of a radical paper.

Māy'hew, (HENRY,) an English littérateur and journalist, born in London in 1812. He was one of the founders of the periodical entitled "Figaro in London," and in 1841 became the first editor of "Punch." He subsequently edited the "Comic Almanac." Among his works may be named "What to Teach, and How to Teach it," (1842,) "London Labour and the London Poor," (1851,) "The Wonders of Science," "The Greatest Plague of Life," "Whom to Marry and How to get Married," "Magic of Kindness," etc. Died July 21, 1887.

Māy'hew, (JONATHAN,) D.D., an American divine, born in Martha's Vineyard in 1720, was distinguished as a preacher and controversialist, and published a number of theological works. Among these we may name "Observations on the Charter and Conduct of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and "Christian Sobriety." Died in 1766.

Māy'nard, (CHARLES JOHNSON,) an American naturalist, born at West Newton, Massachusetts, in 1845. He made special studies in ornithology and on the land shells of the West Indies, and wrote various works on the birds of the United States and American butterflies, also "Naturalist's Guide," "Contributions to Science," "Nature Studies," etc.

Māy'nard, (EDWARD,) an American inventor, born at Madison, New Jersey, in 1813. He became a dental surgeon, and invented many dental instruments. He was appointed court dentist by Nicholas I. of Russia, and for many years was professor in the Baltimore College of Dental Surgery. His later inventions were in firearms and ammunition, and included the tape system of primers, a breech-loading rifle, etc. The Maynard rifle was adopted by the United States and by several European governments. Died in 1891.

Maynard, mą'nâr', (FRANÇOIS,) a French poet, born at Toulouse in 1582, was an intimate friend of Malherbe. He was the author of odes, epigrams, and other poems, which are characterized by La Harpe as possessing great eloquence of diction, but are deficient in warmth. Died in 1646.

Māy'nard, (HORACE,) LL.D., an American statesman, born at Westborough, Massachusetts, August 30, 1814. He graduated at Amherst College in 1838. He removed to Knoxville, Tennessee, where he was (1838–42) professor of mathematics in the University of East Tennessee. He became a lawyer, was a member of Congress, 1857–63 and 1865–75, attorney-general of Tennessee, 1863–65, United States minister at Constantinople, 1875–80, and postmaster-general, 1880–81. Died at Knoxville, May 3, 1882.

Māy'nard, (Sir JOHN,) an English lawyer, born in Devonshire in 1602. He became Cromwell's sergeant in 1653, and, after the restoration, filled the same office under Charles II. He was active in promoting the Revolution of 1688, and was appointed in 1689 one of the lords commissioners of the great seal of England. Died in 1690.

Mayne, mān, (JASPER,) an English divine and poet, born in Devonshire in 1604. He obtained several offices under Charles I., of which he was deprived after Cromwell's usurpation. On the restoration he was appointed chaplain-in-ordinary to Charles II., and Archdeacon of Chichester. He was the author of a comedy entitled "The City Match," and a tragi-comedy called "The Amorous Warre." Died in 1672.

Mayno, mī'no, (JUAN BAUTISTA,) a Spanish painter, born at Toledo about 1590, was drawing-master to Philip IV. Among his best productions are "The Nativity" and "The Resurrection." Died in 1654.

See QUILLIET, "Dictionnaire des Peintres Espagnols.'

Maynwaring, mân'a-ring, (ARTHUR,) an English satirist and political writer, born in Shropshire in 1668. He was for a time attached to the cause of James II., and satirized the government of William III., to which, however, he was afterwards reconciled. After the peace of Ryswick he visited Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Boileau. He was a member of Parliament for Preston in 1705. Maynwaring's productions, both in prose and verse, were much esteemed, and Sir Richard Steele dedicated to him the first volume of the "Tatler." Died in 1712.

See OLDMIXON, "Life and Posthumous Works of A. Maynwaring."

Mayo, mā'o, (AMORY DWIGHT,) an American divine, born at Warwick, Massachusetts, in 1823, became pastor of the First Congregational Unitarian Church in Albany. He published "Graces and Powers of the Christian Life," (1852,) "Symbols of the Capital," and other works. His wife, S. C. EDGARTON MAYO, was the author of a number of poems of great beauty, chiefly on religious subjects. She died about 1850.

Mayo, (FRANK,) an American actor, born at Boston in 1839. He began his theatrical career at sixteen, became a star actor in Shaksperian and other prominent parts in 1869, and produced "Davy Crockett" in 1872, in which he appeared more than two thousand times. Died June 8, 1896.

Mayo, (HERBERT,) an English physician, became professor of anatomy and physiology at King's College, London, and acquired distinction as a lecturer. He was the author of "Outlines of Human Physiology," (1827,) "Outlines of Human Pathology," (1836,) "The Nervous System and its Functions," (1842,) etc. Died near Mentz in 1852.

Mayo, (Mrs. ISABELLA,) an English author, was born at London, December 10, 1843. She was the author of a number of novels, including "Gold and Dross," (1871,) "Crooked Places," (1874,) etc.

He became a journalist at Paris, and published "Odes," (1841,) "L'Espagne moderne," (1855,) "L'Italie moderne," (1860,) "Lamartine," (1872,) and other works, chiefly on public questions. Died in 1893.

Mazarin, maz'ạ-reen', [Fr. pron. mȧ'zȧ'rȧN'; It. MAZARINI, mȧd-zȧ-ree'nee; Lat. MAZARI'NUS,] (GIULIO or JULES,) CARDINAL, a celebrated courtier and prime minister of France, was born in Italy in 1602. He was educated in a college of Jesuits at Rome, (where his father, Pietro Mazarini, resided,) and adopted the profession of law. He had acquired the reputation of an adroit negotiator in the service of the pope, when, in 1630, he met Cardinal Richelieu, who secured his attachment to the interest of France. When the French and Spanish were about to engage at Casal, he prevented a battle, and negotiated the treaty of Cherasco in 1631. He was nuncio extraordinary to France in 1634, and gained the favour of the French king, who sent him as ambassador to Savoy in 1640. Through the influence of the French court, Mazarin was made a cardinal in 1641. The next year he was admitted into the supreme council. The death of Richelieu (in 1642) and of Louis XIII. (in 1643) opened a wider sphere to the ambition of Mazarin, whom Richelieu recommended as his successor. By the will of the late king he was declared sole adviser of the queen-regent, Anne of Austria, in respect to ecclesiastic affairs, and he soon acquired the principal power in the government, as well as the confidence of that queen. He used his power at first with moderation, and courted popularity by gracious and affable manners. He prosecuted the war against Spain which began under his predecessor, and in which Condé and Turenne maintained the honour of the French arms. A dispute which arose between the court and the Parliament of Paris was fomented by Cardinal de Retz into the revolt of the Parisians called "the Day of the Barricades," (August 27, 1648,) and was followed by the civil war of the Fronde. The queen, with her son, Louis XIV., and Mazarin, were driven out of Paris in 1649 by the Frondeurs. This civil war was more remarkable for the levity of the people than for their military exploits. Ladies directed the several factions, and cabals were made or broken by amorous intrigues. In the midst of these domestic broils, Mazarin had been so fortunate or politic as to conclude with the German emperor the famous treaty of Westphalia, (1648,) by which the latter ceded to France the province of Alsace. In 1651 the cardinal was exiled to Cologne; but about two years later he returned to the capital in triumph, and the end of the rebellion, in 1654, restored him to his former power. He made in 1655 a treaty of alliance with Cromwell, who, being solicited as an ally by the French and the Spanish courts, preferred the former. He acquired the same influence over the king, who had attained his majority, as he had exerted over the queen. It is said that Louis XIV. wished to marry Marie Mancini, a niece of his minister, but the latter discouraged the match, and in 1659 negotiated a marriage with a Spanish princess. Mazarin once said "Louis contained the material for four kings and one honest man." He died at Vincennes in March, 1661. His person was remarkably handsome, and his manners fascinating. "Mazarin," says Mignet, "had a far-seeing and inventive mind, a character rather supple than feeble. His device was 'Le Temps et moi.'" Much diversity of opinion exists respecting his merit as a statesman; but it may safely be affirmed that he was able and skilful, and, though avaricious, he was not a cruel or revengeful minister.

Maze, (HIPPOLYTE,) a French historian and statesman, born at Arras in 1839. He held professorships in history at Douai and Versailles, was elected to the Chamber in 1879, and became a Senator in 1886, interesting himself in co-operative provident associations. He wrote histories of the United States and France, "La Lutte contre la Misère," etc. Died in 1891.

Mazel, mȧ'zĕl', (ABRAHAM,) one of the leaders of the Camisards in France, born at Saint-Jean-du-Gard. After the insurrection of the Cévennes, in 1702, he was imprisoned, but, having escaped, he again attempted to rouse the people to revolt, and was killed in a skirmish near Uzès in 1710.

Mazeline, mȧz'lēn', (PIERRE,) a French sculptor, born at Rouen in 1633. The palace of Versailles is adorned with several of his works. Died in 1708.

Ma-zep'pa, (IVAN STEPANOVITCH,) a celebrated Polish adventurer, born in the government of Kief in 1644, was educated at the court of John Casimir, King of Poland. Having been detected in an intrigue with the wife of a nobleman, he was bound by his orders to one of the wild horses of the Ukraine and carried to the country of the Cossacks. He was kindly received by them, and rose to be hetman, or commander-in-chief of their armies, about 1687. When Peter the Great attempted to take possession of the Ukraine, Mazeppa strongly opposed the measure, but, finding resistance vain, entered into a negotiation with Charles XII. of Sweden for the independence of his country. The plan being discovered, and Mazeppa deserted by his troops, he joined the Swedish army, and after the battle of Pultava took refuge in Turkey, where he died in 1709. The adventures of Mazeppa have formed the subject of one of Byron's poems.

Mazois, mȧ'zwȧ', (CHARLES FRANÇOIS,) a French architect and antiquary, born at Lorient in 1783, was employed by Murat, King of Naples, to restore the Portici palace, and other edifices. He afterwards investigated the antiquities of Pompeii. He published in 1811 his principal work, "The Ruins of Pompeii," the last two volumes of which appeared after his death. Died in 1826.

Mazo-Martinez, del, del mȧ'tho mar-tee'nĕth, (JUAN BAUTISTA,) a Spanish painter, born at Madrid about 1620, was a pupil and son-in-law of Velasquez, whom he succeeded in 1661 as painter to Philip IV. His portraits and landscapes are highly esteemed. Died in 1687.

Mazure, mȧ'zür', (F. A. J.,) a French journalist and littérateur, born in Paris in 1776, wrote a "History of the English Revolution of 1688," and a "Life of Voltaire." Died in 1828.

Mazza, (ANGELO,) an Italian poet, born at Parma in 1741, became professor of Greek in his native city, (1768.) He was the author of an ode entitled "Aura Armonica," and a number of lyrics, which obtained for him a high reputation. Died in 1817.

See TIPALDO, "Biografia degli Italiani illustri."

Mazza, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian sculptor, born at Bologna in 1652; died in 1741.

Mazzinghi, mât-sên'gee? (JOSEPH,) an English musician and composer, born in London in 1768, was patronized by George III. and George IV. Among his most popular operas we may name "The Blind Girl," "The Exile," and "Paul and Virginia." Died at Bath in 1844.

Mazzini, mât-see'nee, (GIUSEPPE,) a distinguished Italian patriot and writer, born at Genoa, June 28, 1808, was educated for the profession of law. In his youth he wrote a number of literary articles for the "Indicatore Genovese" and other journals, and was an adherent of the romantic school. He devoted himself at an early age to the liberation and unity of Italy, which was then degraded and oppressed by Austria and by various petty despots. In 1830 he joined the Society of Carbonari, which he proposed to reform. Having been banished or proscribed, he retired in 1831 to Marseilles, where he organized a political association called "Young Italy," (La Giovine Italia,) whose watchword was "God and the People," and whose fundamental idea was that the liberty of the Italians can only be secured by the union of the several states or kingdoms into one nation. He propagated his principles by writings, and, during a long period of exile and adversity, pursued his purpose with invincible constancy.

About 1842 he became a resident of London, and began to contribute political and scientific articles to various journals, among which was the "Westminster Review." His letters were opened in the post-office in 1844 by the British secretary for the home department, Sir James Graham. The revolutionary movements of 1848 restored him to his native country. He issued a journal called "Italia del Popolo," and, although he preferred a republic, was disposed to co-operate with King Charles Albert in resistance to Austrian domination, and he enlisted under the standard of Garibaldi. In February, 1849, he went to Rome, in which a republic had recently been organized after the flight of the pope. He was quickly recognized as the leader and master-spirit of the republicans, and in March of that year Mazzini, Saffi, and Armellini were appointed triumvirs. They defended Rome resolutely against the French army, by which that city was at length captured in July, 1849. Mazzini then went into exile, and chose London as the base of his operations. He associated himself with Kossuth and Ledru-Rollin to form an international revolutionary committee about 1851.

In 1857 he incited an insurrection in Northern Italy, and went to Genoa to direct it; but the movement failed. He co-operated with Garibaldi in his victorious expedition to Sicily in 1860, and opposed the project which Napoleon III. formed for a confederation of Italian states. In 1861 he republished, with additions, an essay "On the Unity of Italy," in which he says, "I know that the idea of a confederation is both the counsel and design of one whom many Italians still regard as the friend and protector of Italy; but I know, too, that he is treacherous, a foreigner, and a despot. That he should seek to weaken in order to dominate us is easily understood; but the mere fact that the suggestion springs from such a source ought to be one of the most powerful warnings against it."

Some of his predictions have been verified by recent events in Italy, which have tended to raise his reputation for sagacity and practical wisdom. He is the author of a work entitled "The Duties of Man," (1858; English version, 1862,) which enjoys great popularity in Italy, and of many other works. The "Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini," in English, have appeared in 6 vols., (1864–70.) He died at Pisa, March 10, 1872, and was buried in his native town.

The character of Mazzini is well described by Thomas Carlyle in a letter to the London "Times," June, 1844, reprinted in the "Westminster Review" for September of that year. He says, "I have had the honour to know M. Mazzini for a series of years; and I can, with great freedom, testify to all men that he, if I have ever seen one such, is a man of genius and virtue, a man of sterling veracity, humanity, and nobleness of mind,—one of those rare men, numerable, unfortunately, but as units in this world, who are worthy to be called martyr-souls; who in silence piously in their daily life understand and practise what is meant by that."

Mazzola, Mazzuola, mat-soo-o'lâ, or Mazzuoli, mât-soo-o'lee, (GIROLAMO FRANCESCO MARIA,) an eminent Italian painter, surnamed IL PARMIGIANO, ("the Parmesan,") born at Parma in 1503. He visited Rome in 1523, and was employed by Clement VII. to execute a number of works in that city. His style, formed on that of Correggio and Raphael, is characterized by exceeding grace and delicacy of form and softness of colouring, and it was said by his admirers that "the spirit of Raphael had passed into him." Among his master-pieces are the "Madonna della Rosa," in the gallery of Dresden, an "Annunciation," in the principal church of Viadana, the "Madonna with Saint Margaret, Saint Jerome," etc., in the Museum at Bologna, the "Madonna dello Lungo Collo," at Florence, and the "Vision of Saint Jerome," in the National Gallery, London. Mazzola was the first Italian artist who engraved with aquafortis. Died in 1540.

McKinley, (WILLIAM.) See MACKINLEY.

Mēad, (LARKIN GOLDSMITH,) an American sculptor, was born at Chesterfield, New Hampshire, January 3, 1835, and became a citizen of Vermont. He became in 1852 a pupil of H. K. Brown. Among his works are "The Recording Angel," (1855,) "Vermont," (1857,) statues of Ethan Allen, (1861, 1874,) "The Returned Soldier," (1866,) and a great part of the Lincoln monument at Springfield, Illinois, besides many statuettes, portrait-busts, etc.

Mēad, (MATTHEW,) an English nonconformist divine, born in Buckinghamshire in 1629. He was the author of "The Young Man's Remembrancer," and "Sermons on Ezekiel's Wheels." Died in 1699.

Mead, (RICHARD,) a celebrated English physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney in 1673. He studied at Leyden, and subsequently visited Italy, where he took his medical degree at Padua. He was afterwards elected a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the College of Physicians, and on the accession of George II. (1727) became his physician-in-ordinary. He was the author of a "Mechanical Account of Poisons," (1702,) "A Short Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion," (1720,) which was translated into French and Latin, "Medicina Sacra," (1749,) or an account of diseases mentioned in the Bible, and other medical works of a high character. Died in 1754.

Meade, meed, (GEORGE G.,) a distinguished American general, was born December 31, 1815, at Cadiz, in Spain, where his father, R. W. Meade, was United States consul. He graduated at West Point in 1835, served in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and became a captain in 1856. He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers in August, 1861, and served in the battle of Gaines's Mill, June 27, 1862. At Malvern Hill he received two wounds, July 1. He commanded a division at Antietam, September 17, 1862. Having been raised to the rank of major-general, he directed a corps at the battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, and at that of Chancellorsville, May 2–3, 1863. On the 28th of June ensuing, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Potomac. Just before the date last named, General Lee had invaded Pennsylvania with a large army, which the Union army encountered at Gettysburg on the 1st of July. General Meade, whose forces occupied a good position on a range of hills, acted mostly on the defensive at this battle, which lasted three days and contributed largely to the triumph of the Union cause. (See LEE, R. E.) General Meade reported that he took at Gettysburg 13,621 prisoners, some of whom were probably wounded, and he lost 16,643 killed and wounded. He was promoted to be a brigadier-general of the regular army by a commission dated July 3, 1863. About the 18th of July he moved his army across the Potomac into Virginia, where he had several skirmishes with the enemy in October and November, 1863. He was second in command of the army of the Potomac in its operations against Richmond in 1864. "I tried as far as possible," says General Grant, "to leave General Meade in independent command of the army of the Potomac. My instructions for that army were all through him, and were general in their nature, leaving all the details and the execution to him. The campaigns that followed proved him to be the right man in the right place." In August, 1864, he was appointed a major-general of the regular army. The army of which he had the immediate command fought great battles at the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court-House, and Cold Harbour, and was employed many months in the siege of Petersburg. (See GRANT, U. S.) General Meade was appointed commander of the third military district, comprising Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, in 1867. Died Nov. 6, 1872.

Meade, (RICHARD KIDDER,) an American soldier of the Revolution, born in Nansemond county, Virginia, about 1750, was one of General Washington's aides. Died in 1805.

Meade, (RICHARD WORSAM,) an American admiral, born at New York city in 1837. He entered the navy in 1850, served through the civil war, and continued in active service, becoming captain in 1880, commodore in 1892, and rear-admiral in 1894. He was naval commissioner to the Columbian Exposition in 1893. In 1895, in consequence of a remark offensive to President Cleveland, he was rebuked, and retired from the service. Died in 1897.

Meade, (WILLIAM,) D.D., son of Richard Kidder Meade, born in Clarke county, Virginia, in 1789. He graduated at Princeton College in 1808, and in 1841 succeeded Bishop Moore as bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia. He published several theological works. Died in 1862.

Having spent many years in China, Java, and Malacca, and become thoroughly versed in the languages of those countries, he published a "Chinese-and-English Dictionary," (1842,) "Chinese Dialogues," (1844,) "English-and-Japanese Vocabulary," and other works. Died in 1857.

Medici, (ALESSANDRO DE'.) See LEO XI.

Medici, de', dȧ mĕd'e-chee or mā'de-chee, (ALESSANDRO,) the subverter of the liberties of Florence, born in 1510, is supposed by some to have been a natural son of Lorenzo, Duke of Urbino, and by others, of the cardinal Giulio de' Medici, afterwards Clement VII. After the sacking of Rome, in 1527, the latter made a treaty with the emperor Charles V. in 1529, by which it was agreed that the Medici should be restored to their former rank at Florence, with Alexander as chief of the republic. A marriage was also arranged between him and Margaret of Austria, a natural daughter of the emperor. In 1530 Florence was taken by the Imperial troops under Ferdinand de Gonzaga, and soon after the pope obtained from the emperor a diploma which was to decide the constitution of Florence. By this article Alexander was declared head of the republic, but the Florentines were left in possession of the same privileges they had enjoyed under the former Medici. At length, by the united intrigues of Clement VII. and Alexander, the latter was declared duke of the republic in 1532, and the old form of government was abolished. He now signalized himself by every species of cruelty and oppression. In 1535, Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici, whom he had long feared as a rival, was poisoned by his orders; and he is believed to have caused the death of his own mother in the same manner. In 1537, Lorenzino de' Medici, a distant relative of the duke, desiring to rid his country of such a tyrant, procured his assassination. Alexander left a son, named Giuliano.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes;" MADAME ALLART, "Histoire de la République de Florence."

Medici, de', (COSIMO or COSMO,) surnamed THE ELDER, a celebrated statesman of the Florentine republic, was born in 1389. He was a liberal patron of learning and the arts, and made a munificent use of the immense fortune he had accumulated by commerce, in adorning his native city with public edifices and founding institutions for educational and charitable purposes. Among the most important of these was an academy at Florence for teaching the Platonic philosophy, at the head of which he placed Marsilio Ficino. He also made a large collection of Latin, Greek, and Oriental manuscripts, which he bestowed on the Laurentian Library. These benefits, and the urbanity and moderation of his character, won for him great personal popularity and the title of "Father of his Country." To give a detailed account of his services to literature and art would be to write the history of the Renaissance in the first half of the fifteenth century. In the words of Ginguené, "One saw at Florence Masaccio and Lippi adorn churches and palaces with the productions of their pencil, Donatelli give life and expression to marble, and Brunelleschi, architect, sculptor, and poet, raise the magnificent cupola of Santa Maria del Fiore; while the Greek refugees, in return for the noble asylum he had given them, spread abroad the treasures of their beautiful language and the masterpieces of their orators, philosophers, and poets." Cosimo died in 1464, leaving a son, named Piero.

Medici, de', (COSIMO,) called THE GREAT, [Lat. COS'MUS MEDICE'US MAG'NUS,] son of the general Giovanni de' Medici, was born in 1519. On the death of Alexander he was declared his successor in 1537, through the influence of Cardinal Cibo, which choice was confirmed by Charles V. In 1537 he obtained a victory at Montemerlo over the hostile Florentines. Cruel and suspicious in his disposition, he caused upwards of four hundred Florentine emigrants to be put to death in the early part of his reign, and, having deprived the magistrates of all authority, was invested with absolute power. In 1554 the Marquis de Marignano, one of his generals, defeated the French army under Marshal Strozzi, at Siannagallo, and soon after Philip II., having succeeded the emperor, conferred upon the Duke of Florence the state of Sienna, with the exception of the ports. In 1562 Giovanni de' Medici, a son of Cosimo, died suddenly, as is supposed, by the hand of his brother Don Garcias. A short time after, the latter also died, and his father was charged with his death. Eleonora of Toledo, wife of the grand duke, soon followed her sons, and her death was likewise attributed to Cosimo. These fatal events form the subject of Alfieri's tragedy of "Don Garcias." In 1564 Cosimo made his son Francesco his associate in the government, and in 1569 he was declared Grand Duke of Tuscany by a bull of Pius V. He died in 1574, leaving three legitimate sons, Francesco, Ferdinand, and Piero.

Medici, de', (COSIMO II.,) Grand Duke of Tuscany, born in 1590, was a son of Ferdinand I. He began to reign in 1609, and ruled with moderation and clemency. Died in 1621.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (COSIMO III.,) a son of Ferdinand II., was born in 1642, and became grand duke in 1670. He married Marguerite d'Orléans, (a daughter of Gaston de France,) who regarded Cosimo with extreme dislike and caused him much trouble. He died in 1723, and his family then became extinct.

See BOTTA, "Storia d'Italia."

Medici, de', (FRANCESCO,) Grand Duke of Tuscany, was a son of Cosimo the Great, and was born March 25, 1541. He began to reign on his own account in 1574, and proved a suspicious, false, and despotic tyrant. Love of science, art, and letters was his only virtue. In 1578 he married his mistress, the beautiful Bianca Capello. Died at Poggio a Caiano, October 18, 1587.

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI.) See LEO X.

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI,) an Italian statesman, born in 1360, was the father of Cosimo the Elder, noticed above. He amassed a large fortune by commerce, and rose through various offices to be gonfaloniere of justice in 1421. Died in 1428.

See MACHIAVEL, "Storie Fiorentine."

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI,) an Italian general, of the same family as the preceding, was born in 1498. He distinguished himself both by his courage and his ferocity in the civil wars of his country, and afterwards entered the French service. He was mortally wounded in battle in 1526.

Medici, de', (GIULIANO,) youngest son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born in 1478. He married in 1515 Philiberta of Savoy, aunt of Francis I., by whom he was created Duke of Nemours. Died in 1516.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (GIULIO.) See CLEMENT VII.

Medici, de', (IPPOLITO,) an Italian cardinal, born at Urbino in 1511, was a natural son of Giuliano, noticed above. He possessed immense wealth, and was noted for his accomplishments and his profligacy. He died in 1535, from the effects of poison administered, it is supposed, by order of Alessandro de' Medici, Duke of Florence.

See VARCHI, "Istoria Fiorentina."

Medici, de', (LORENZO I.,) surnamed THE MAGNIFICENT, [Fr. LAURENT LE MAGNIFIQUE, lō'rŏN' lẽh măn'-ye'fêk'; Lat. LAUREN'TIUS MED'ICES or MEDICE'US; It. LORENZO IL MAGNIFICO, lo-rĕn'zo ēl mân-yē'fē-ko,] Prince of Florence, was born in 1448. He was the son of Piero I., and grandson of Cosimo the Elder, and, having early entered public life, succeeded to the influence and popularity of his predecessors. He was carefully educated by the best masters of the time, being instructed in the Platonic philosophy by the celebrated Marsilio Ficino. In 1478 he narrowly escaped falling a victim to a conspiracy formed by the Pazzi family of Florence in conjunction with the Archbishop of Pisa and Pope Sixtus IV. His brother Giuliano was assassinated, and he received a slight wound. The Archbishop of Pisa was hanged for this offence, and Lorenzo was excommunicated by Pope Sixtus IV. In 1484 the latter died, and was succeeded by Innocent VIII., who became a friend and ally of Lorenzo. Florence enjoyed great prosperity under the government of Lorenzo, who acquired the favour of the people by his munificence, prudence, and clemency. He was highly distinguished as a patron of literature and art, founded at Florence an academy for the study of the antique, and expended large sums in the erection of public edifices and in the collection of libraries. He also attained considerable eminence as a poet. Died in April, 1492.

Medici, de', (LORENZO II.,) eldest son of Piero II., born at Florence in 1492, was placed, through the influence of his uncle, Leo X., at the head of the republic. He married in 1518 Madeleine de La Tour, daughter of Jean, Count d'Auvergne, and died in 1519, leaving an infant daughter, Catherine de Médicis, afterwards Queen of France.

Medici, de', (LUDOVICO,) Duke of Sarto, called also the CHEVALIER DE MEDICI, a Neapolitan statesman, born in 1760. He was appointed minister of finance in 1810, and in 1815 was sent as ambassador to Vienna. Died in 1830.

Medici, de', (PIERO I.,) eldest son of Cosimo the Elder, born in 1414, succeeded his father as chief of the Florentine republic. He had powerful rivals in the Pitti family and other nobles of Florence, whose attempt to assassinate him was defeated by the prudence of his son Lorenzo. Died in 1469.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (PIERO II.,) eldest son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born at Florence in 1471. He succeeded to the rank and influence of his father in the republic; but his arrogance and rashness soon deprived him of the popularity hitherto enjoyed by his family. On the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII., in 1494, Piero made overtures to the French king, into whose hands he surrendered several important places. Having subsequently entered the French army, he shared in its defeat at the Garigliano by Gonsalvo de Córdova in 1503, and was drowned in attempting to cross the river.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (SALVESTRO,) a Florentine statesman, belonged to the Ghibeline faction, and was one of the principal rivals of the Albizzi family. He was made gonfaloniere of justice in 1378; but, the Guelph party having again come into power, he was banished in 1381.

Mehemet-Alee, (or -Ali,) mĕh'hẹh-mĕt ȧ'lee, or Mo-ham'med-Al'ee, Viceroy of Egypt, was born at Kavala in 1769. Having lost his parents at an early age, he was protected by the Turkish governor of the town. His distinguished abilities and energy soon won for him a high reputation, and he was sent in 1799 to assist the British in expelling the French from Egypt. He was appointed in 1804 Pasha of Cairo, for his services in defending that city from the oppression of the Mamelukes, and in 1806 was made Governor of Upper Egypt by the Sultan. After a protracted contest with the Mamelukes, who had for centuries been the scourge of the country, Mehemet Alee invited them to a festival at Cairo, and, having enclosed them in the citadel, ordered a general massacre, in which four hundred and seventy perished, (1811.) This sanguinary act was followed by the destruction of the Mamelukes in other parts of Egypt. In 1830 he invaded Syria, which he soon subdued, and which, after the interference of the sovereigns of Europe, was ceded to him by the Sultan, on condition of his being a vassal of the Porte, (1833.) The Sultan, becoming jealous of his powerful rival, made a treaty, in conjunction with several European powers, in 1841, by which Mehemet was obliged to relinquish Syria, but his family was permitted to retain the pashalic of Egypt. He died in 1849, having the previous year resigned the government to his son, Ibrâheem Pasha. As a ruler, Mehemet Alee displayed talents of a very high order, and few princes have founded more beneficent institutions or shown a more just and liberal spirit. He established schools and colleges, created an army and navy, and introduced the manufactures of Europe. He protected his Christian subjects, and aided by his liberality the researches of Champollion, Lepsius, and other eminent savants.

Mehemet-Alee, (Pasha,) mĕh'hẹh-mĕt ȧ'lee pȧ'shȧ', an Ottoman minister of state, born at Trebizond about 1807. He became a general of division in 1840, and married a daughter of Sultan Mahmood in 1844. He was grand vizier of Turkey from October, 1852, to May, 1853. Died in 1865.

Méhul, mȧ'ül', (ÉTIENNE HENRI,) a celebrated French composer, born in the department of Ardennes in 1763.

Having previously received some instruction from Hauser, a German organist, he repaired in 1778 to Paris, where he became a pupil of Gluck. In 1790 he brought out bis opera of "Euphrosyne and Coradin," which met with brilliant success and was pronounced by Grétry equal to the finest productions of Gluck. Among his operas, which are more than forty in number, we may name 'Stratonice," "Joseph in Égypt," and "The Blind Man of Toledo." His "Song of Victory" and other popular melodies of the kind are also greatly admired. Méhul was one of the inspectors of the Conservatory of Music, and a member of the French Institute. Died in 1817.

Me-lam'pus, [Gr. Μελάμπους; Fr. MÉLAMPE, mā'lŏnp',] a mythical personage of Argos, famous as a soothsayer, was a son of Amythaon. He was considered as the first mortal that possessed prophetic power, and the first that practised medicine.

Me-lăn'ch'thon [Ger. pron. mā-lănk'ton] or Melan'thon, (PHILIP,) an eminent German Reformer and scholar, whose original name was SCHWARZERD or SCHWARZERDT, (shwärts'ĕrt: i.e. "Black Earth,") which, according to the usage of the time, he changed into Greek, was born at Bretten, in the Palatinate, February 16, 1497. His father was a skilful and prosperous armourer. He entered in 1507 the Academy of Pforzheim, where he enjoyed the patronage of Reuchlin, who was his great-uncle. About the age of twelve he passed to the University of Heidelberg, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and went in 1512 to finish his studies in the University of Tübingen. He learned the Greek language, mathematics, jurisprudence, etc., and remained in this university a number of years, during which he gave public lectures on the classics and other subjects. In 1518 he was appointed professor of Greek in the University of Wittenberg, then recently founded, and there became the colleague and friend of Luther, whose doctrines he adopted. The renown of his learning and eloquence soon attracted multitudes of students from all parts of Germany. In 1519 Luther and Melanchthon held a public disputation at Leipsic with Eckius, one of the ablest champions of the Roman Catholic Church. Melanchthon married in 1520 Katharina Krapp, daughter of a burgomaster of Wittenberg. It appears that he was never ordained as a minister of the gospel. He gave much attention to biblical exegesis, and became a prominent advocate of the Reformed religion by his writings. Compared with the other Reformers, he was distinguished for moderation and gentleness, which tended to restrain the impetuosity of Luther. In 1521 he published an able defence of the Reformed doctrines, in a systematic treatise on theology, entitled "Loci communes Rerum theologicarum," which enjoyed great popularity. It was commended by Luther as being "next to the Holy Scriptures the most excellent work on theology." He aided Luther in his German translation of the Bible, on which he expended much time, (1522–34.) In 1529 he attended the Diet of Spire. Having been appointed by the leading Reformers to compose a formal exposition of the Lutheran faith, he wrote the celebrated "Augsburg Confession," which was presented to the emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, and is perhaps the most important symbolical book of the Lutheran Church. A Latin version of this Confession was published under the title of "Confessio Fidei exhibita invictissimo Imperatori Carolo V.," etc., (1531.) He also wrote, in reply to certain Catholic theologians, an "Apology of the Confession," ("Apologie der Augsburgischen Confession.") He was invited by Henry VIII. of England and Francis I. of France to visit their courts; but he declined both invitations, and remained at Wittenberg. He was one of the theologians that disputed with the Roman Catholics at the Conference of Worms (1540) and the Conference of Ratisbon, (1541,) where he proposed concessions and compromises which the other Reformers rejected. After the death of Luther, in 1546 Melanchthon was recognized as the leader of the Reformation in Germany. His conduct was conformed to the maxim "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas," ("In essentials unity, in doubtful points liberty, in all things charity,") which subjected him to violent denunciations from some Protestant zealots. In 1551 he was sent as a delegate to the Council of Trent, which, however, was dispersed by the hostile movements of Maurice of Saxony before Melanchthon arrived at Trent. The latter years of his life were greatly troubled by the acrimonious dissensions among the Protestant theologians. He died at Wittenberg on the 19th of April, 1560, leaving three surviving children. He was a man of small stature. Among his numerous works were "Elements of Logic and Ethics," a Greek Grammar, Commentaries on the Scriptures, editions of several classic authors, with notes, and an extensive correspondence with his eminent contemporaries. An edition of his works was published at Wittenberg by his son-in-law, Peucer, in 1562–64.

Me-le-ā'ĝer, [Gr. Μελέαγρος; Fr. MÉLÉAGRE, mā'lā'ăgr',] a famous hero of classic mythology, was a son of Œneus and Althæa, or, as others say, a son of Mars. According to tradition, when he was seven days old the Moiræ (or Fates) warned his mother that he would die as soon as the billet which was burning on her hearth should be consumed. Althæa then extinguished the fatal brand and hid it in a chest. He signalized his valour in the Argonautic expedition and the Calydonian hunt. He fought with the Calydonians against the Curetes, and offended his mother by killing her brothers. She therefore cast the above-mentioned brand into the fire, and Meleager speedily died.

Meleager, [Gr. Μελεάγρος,] a Macedonian general, who served under Alexander the Great, and, after the death of that monarch, attempted to raise Arrhidæus to the throne in opposition to Perdiccas. His partisans were defeated, and he was put to death, 323 B.C.

Melendez-Valdez, mā-lĕn'dĕth văl'dĕth, or Valdes, văl'dĕs, (JUAN ANTONIO,) an eminent Spanish poet, born in Estremadura in 1754. He studied law at Salamanca, where he became intimate with the poet Cadalso, and distinguished himself by his attainments in English literature, of which he was a warm admirer. His idyl "Batilo" (1780) won the prize at the Spanish Academy, and another was given to his "Pindaric Ode on the Fine Arts" by the Academy of San Fernando. He published in 1785 a collection of lyric and pastoral poems, which established his reputation as the first Spanish poet of his time. He had been appointed in 1781, through the influence of his friend Jovellanos, professor of humanities at Salamanca. In 1791 he obtained an important office in the chancery of Valladolid, and in 1798 became fiscal of the supreme court of Madrid. He published in 1797 another collection of poems, dedicated to Godoy, who soon after appointed him to a high office at court. On the fall of the minister Jovellanos, Melendez was exiled from Madrid, to which he was not permitted to return until the fall of Godoy, (1808.) Having subsequently joined the French party in Spain, he was created councillor of state and minister of public instruction by Joseph Bonaparte. He died in France in 1817. Of Melendez, Ticknor observes, "There can be no doubt that he was better fitted to form a new school and give a guiding impulse to the national poetry, than any writer that had appeared in Spain for above a century."

Me-le'tus, [Μέλητος,] written less correctly Me-li'tus, a Greek tragic poet, is chiefly known as one of the three principal accusers of Socrates. He was a licentious writer, and a man of profligate habits. He was put to death by the Athenians when they repented of their treatment of Socrates.

Mel'fort, (JOHN DRUMMOND,) DUKE OF, was prime minister to King James II. of England, whom he accompanied in his exile to France. Being accused of planning a second invasion of England, he was banished by Louis XIV. to Angers, where he died in 1716.

Melgarejo, mel-gâ-rà'ho, (MARIANO,) a Bolivian president, born about 1810, entered the army at an early age, distinguished himself in many revolutions, acquired immense popularity, and was often wounded, taken prisoner, or exiled. In December, 1864, he issued a pronunciamiento at Cochabamba against his brother-in-law, President Acha, whom he overthrew. He maintained himself in power as dictator against many insurrections until January, 1870, when he was overthrown by Morales. He then went to Lima, where he was killed in a quarrel by his son-in-law, November 23, 1870.

Meli, mā'lee, (GIOVANNI,) an eminent Sicilian poet, born at Palermo about 1740. His works, consisting chiefly of eclogues, odes, and sonnets, are written in the Sicilian dialect, to which he gave a grace and refinement hitherto unknown. His pastoral poems are exquisite specimens of their kind, especially the "Ecloghe Pescatorie," or fishermen's dialogues, distinguished for their humour and the graceful simplicity of their language. Meli also wrote satires and fables, and a mock-heroic poem entitled "Don Quixote." Died in 1815.

Mĕl'mŏth, (WILLIAM,) an English lawyer, born in 1666, was the author of a work entitled "Great Importance of a Religious Life," which was ascribed by Walpole to the first Earl of Egmont. One hundred thousand copies of this work were printed after the author's death. Died in 1743.

See NICHOLS, "Literary Anecdotes;" "Memoirs of a Late Eminent Advocate."

Melmoth, (WILLIAM,) an English littérateur, a son of the preceding, was born in 1710. He published in 1747 a translation of the "Letters of Pliny," which is esteemed one of the best versions of a Latin author in the English language, and is mentioned by Warton as "one of the few that are better than the original." He also translated the "Letters of Cicero to Several of his Friends," and the treatises "On Friendship" ("De Amicitiâ") and "On Old Age" ("De Senectute") of the same author. Died in 1799.

Melnikov, mel'ne-kov, (PAWEL IVANOWITCH,) a Russian author, born at Nizhnee-Novgorod, October 22, 1819. He studied (1834–37) at Kazan University, and in 1846 entered the civil service. Besides histories of the Russian schismatical sects, he published noteworthy novels, among them "Old Times" and "Beyond the Volga." Died in 1883.

Melo. See MELLO.

Melon, mĕh-lôN', (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a French littérateur, resided at Bordeaux, and, in conjunction with the Duke de la Force, founded the Academy of that city in 1712. He afterwards became secretary to the regent Orléans. He wrote "Mahmoud the Gaznevide," an allegorical history of the regency, and a "Political Essay on Commerce." The latter work was highly commended by Voltaire. Died in 1738.

Melot, mĕh-lo', (ANICET,) a French savant, born at Dijon in 1697, became in 1738 a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, to which he contributed several able treatises. In 1741 he was appointed royal librarian. He wrote a "Dissertation on the Capture of Rome by the Gauls," and other antiquarian works. Died in 1759.

Melozzo da Forlì, mā-lot'so dā for-lee', (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Forlì in 1438, invented the sotto in su, and discovered the rules of vertical perspective. Among his finest extant frescos is "Sixtus IV. giving to Platina charge of the Vatican Library," now in the Vatican. His works are highly commended by Vasari. He excelled in foreshortening. Died in 1492.

Mel-pom'ĕ-nē, [Gr. Μελπομένη; Fr. MELPOMÈNE, mĕl'po'mą'n',] one of the nine Muses, presided over tragedy, and was represented as holding in her hand a tragic mask. She was said to be the mother of the Sirens. (See MUSÆ.)

Melun, de, dĕh mĕh-lŭN', (CHARLES,) a French statesman under Louis XI., was appointed in 1465 grand master of France. Having subsequently incurred the displeasure of the king, he was condemned to death and executed, (1468.)

Melvil. See MELVILLE, and MALEVILL.

Melvill van Carnbée, mĕl'vil văn karn'bā, (PIETER,) BARON, a geographer and naval officer, born at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1816. He produced the "Mariner's Guide." ("Zeeman's Gid," 1842.) Died in 1856.

Melville, mĕl'vil, (ANDREW,) an eminent Scottish Reformer and scholar, born in Forfarshire in 1545. He studied in Paris, and subsequently became professor of humanities at Geneva. After his return to Scotland he was appointed principal of Glasgow College, where he introduced great improvements in the discipline and was eminently successful as a teacher. He was actively engaged in the religious controversies of the time, and was chiefly instrumental in the abolition of episcopacy in Scotland. He became in 1580 principal of Saint Mary's College, Saint Andrew's, where he also filled the chair of theology and the Oriental tongues. Having given offence to King James by his bold opposition to the measures of the court, he was imprisoned five years, and subsequently retired to France, and was appointed professor of theology at Sedan. Died in 1622.

Melville, (GEORGE WALLACE,) an American naval engineer, born at New York, January 10, 1841. He was appointed to the navy as assistant engineer in 1861, served through the civil war, and in 1869 sailed on the Jeannette Polar Expedition. He headed the boat's crew which survived the Arctic rigors and the expedition which afterwards recovered the remains of De Long and his comrades in the Lena delta. He was specially rewarded by Congress for his courage, was appointed engineer-in-chief of the navy in 1887, and given the rank of rear-admiral in 1899. He made three Arctic voyages in all.

Melville, (GEORGE WHYTE,) an English novelist, born about 1820. He was a captain in the Coldstream Guards. He produced many novels, the best-known of which are "Digby Grand," (1853,) "Tilbury Nogo," (1853,) "General Bounce," (1854,) "Kate Coventry," (1856,) "Holmby House," (1860,) "The Gladiators," (1863,) and "Katerfelto," (1875.) Died December 5, 1878.

Melville, (HERMAN,) an American novelist and traveller, born in New York in 1819. Having made a voyage to the Pacific in 1841, he spent several months on one of the Marquesas Islands, and subsequently visited the Sandwich and Society Islands. He published, after his return, a narrative of his adventures, entitled "Typee," (1846,) which was received with great favour, both in the United States and England. Among his other principal works are "Omoo, a Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas," "White Jacket, or the World in a Man-of-War," (1850,) and "The Piazza Tales." Died in New York, September 28, 1891.

See DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature," vol. II.

Melville or Melvil, (Sir JAMES,) a Scottish statesman and historian, born in Fifeshire in 1530. Having been appointed page to Mary Queen of Scots during her residence in France, he accompanied her on her return to Scotland, and was made her privy councillor and employed in several important negotiations. He died in 1606, leaving in manuscript a work published in 1683, under the title of "Memoirs of Sir James Melvil of Halhill," etc., which are highly valuable as records of his time. Froude speaks of Melville as "a man who, without the faintest pretensions to statesmanship, was as skilled an intriguer as Europe could boast." ("History of England," vol. viii. chap. viii.)

Memmi. See MARTINI, (SIMONE DI.)

Memminger, mĕm'min-jer, ? (CHARLES GUSTAVUS,) a native of Würtemberg, Germany, born in 1803, settled at Charleston, South Carolina, where he became distinguished as a lawyer and politician. He zealously opposed the State Rights party, which he satirized in his "Book of Nullification," (1832.) He was appointed secretary of the treasury in the cabinet of Jefferson Davis in February, 1861, and resigned in June, 1864. Died March 7, 1888.

Mem'mi-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman tribune, was a strenuous opponent of the aristocrats. He became tribune of the people in 111 B.C., and exposed the venality and corruption of the aristocratic leaders in their management of the Jugurthine war. While a candidate for the consulship, he was killed by the mob led by Saturninus in 100 B.C.

Memmius, (CAIUS GEMELLUS,) a Roman orator, poet, and politician, was a tribune of the people in 66 B.C., and prætor in 58. He was a son-in-law of Sulla, and friend of Lucretius, who dedicated to him his poem "De Rerum Naturâ." He is also frequently mentioned by Cicero. Having been accused of bribery, (ambitus,) he went into exile about 54 B.C.

Mem'non, [Gr. Μέμνων,] a mythical personage, supposed to have been a son of Tithonus and Eos, (Aurora,) and a king of Ethiopia or Egypt. According to tradition, he fought for the Trojans at the siege of Troy, slew Antilochus, and was killed by Achilles. The poets feigned that the dew-drops which appear in the morning are the tears which Aurora shed for the death of Memnon. Many writers identify Memnon with Amenophis II. of Egypt, in whose honour was erected the celebrated colossal statue near Thebes. This statue, which is still extant and is about fifty feet high, was commonly believed by the ancients to emit a sound when it was first touched by the beams of the morning sun. Some writers, including Sir Gardner Wilkinson, believe that the phenomenon was the result of imposture.

See SIR J. GARDNER WILKINSON, "Topography of Thebes," pp. 33–37.

Mem'non, a Greek general in the service of Darius, King of Persia, attained the rank of high admiral, and Governor of Western Asia. He had great military talents. Died in 333 B.C.

See CLINTON, "Fasti Hellenici."

Memnon, a Greek historian, supposed to have lived under the reign of Augustus or the Antonines. He wrote a history of Heraclea, of which only fragments are extant.

Mena, de, dà mā'nà, (FELIPE GIL,) a Spanish portrait-painter of great merit, born at Valladolid in 1600; died in 1674.

Mena, de, (JUAN,) a Spanish poet, born at Córdova about 1410. He was patronized by John II., King of Castile, who made him his Latin secretary and historiographer. His principal work is an allegorical poem, entitled "The Labyrinth," ("El Labirinto,") which enjoyed a high reputation in his time. He was an intimate friend of Henry de Villena, the Marquis de Santillana, and other eminent writers of that age. Died in 1456.

See TICKNOR, "History of Spanish Literature;" PRESCOTT, "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," vol. i. pp. 18, 19, 20; LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe."

Menabrea, mà-nà-brā'à, (LÉON CAMILLE,) a littérateur, born near Chambéry in 1804. He wrote several works on mediæval antiquities, and left unfinished an important work entitled "Les Alpes historiques." Died in 1857.

Menabrea, mà-nà-brā'à, (LUIGI F.,) COUNT, an Italian general and statesman, born about 1809. He was appointed minister of foreign affairs and president of the council of ministers of the kingdom of Italy in 1867 and in 1869.

Menæchmus, mé-nék'mus, [Μέναιχμος,] a Greek sculptor, born at Naupactus, lived about 480 B.C. His principal work was a statue, in gold and silver, of Diana Laphyra at Calydon, in which he was assisted by Soidas.

Ménage, mà'năzh', (GILLES,) a celebrated French critic and scholar, born at Angers in 1613. He studied law, and practised for a time in Paris, where he became an advocate to the Parliament. He subsequently devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits, and his house became the resort of the distinguished wits and writers of the time, including Balzac, Sarrazin, and Madame Rambouillet. He was patronized by Paul de Gondi, afterwards Cardinal de Retz, whose favour he subsequently lost, owing to his arrogance and strong propensity for satire. He was also involved in a literary feud with Boileau, who has severely satirized him in one of his poems, and with Molière, who introduced him into his "Femmes savantes," in the character of Vadius. His reputation rests principally on his "Etymological Dictionary of the French Language," (1650,) which is still a useful work. He also published poems in Latin, French, and Italian, and his friends made a collection of his witticisms, etc., entitled "Ménagiana," (1693,) which ranks among the best productions of the kind. His "Request of the Dictionaries," a satire on the Dictionary of the French Academy, is believed to have been the cause of his exclusion from that institution. Died in Paris, July 23, 1692.

Mencius, mẽn'she-us, the Latinized form of Meng-Tse, mẽng'tsẹh', or Meng-Tseu, mẽng'tsuh', (named also Meng-Kho, in his youth,) was, after Confucius, the most celebrated of all the Chinese philosophers. He was born in the little state of Tsow, (or Tsou,) which was subsequently included in the kingdom of Loo, and in the modern province of Shan-Toong, (or Shan-Tung,) about 370 years before Christ: he was, therefore, a contemporary of Plato and Aristotle. He lost his father in his early childhood. To his mother, who appears to have been a woman of rare intelligence and worth, he was indebted, in a great measure, not merely for his inclination towards learning and philosophy, but also for that pure and lofty virtue for which he was so distinguished. It is related that after the death of her husband she resided for a short time near a butcher's shop, but, fearing that the frequent sight of scenes of blood might harden and deprave the heart of her son, she removed to another abode. This happened to be near a cemetery, and young Mencius amused himself with acting the various scenes which he witnessed at the tombs. "This," said his mother to herself, "is no place for my son." She again changed her dwelling, and took a house in the marketplace. But here he soon began to play the part of a salesman, vaunting his wares and chaffering with customers. The watchful and anxious mother was not yet satisfied. At last she found a house close by a school. Her son's attention was attracted by the various studies and exercises which he saw pursued in the school, and a desire for learning was awakened in his mind. Soon after she sent him to the school; and he is said to have distinguished himself by the quickness of his intellect, and subsequently by his earnest application to study. The following story may serve to show his mother's conscientious watchfulness in regard to the moral education of her son. Seeing a butcher killing pigs, he asked her what that was done for. She replied rather thoughtlessly, (as it appears,) "It is to furnish you with food." Her conscience at once reproved her for saying what was not strictly true, and, anxious not to set him an example of untruthfulness, she went and bought some pork in order to make good her words. One day when he returned home from school, she looked up from the web which she happened to be weaving, and asked him how he was getting on. He answered, carelessly, that he was doing well enough, whereupon she took a knife and cut through her web. Alarmed, he inquired what she meant. She then showed him that she had only done what he was doing: she had lost her labour and thrown away the time she had spent in weaving the web, he also was throwing away his precious time through neglect of his studies. The lesson was not lost upon him, and did not need to be repeated.

Some writers represent Mencius as having studied under Tseu-sse, (or Tsze-sze,) the grandson of Confucius. But this is scarcely possible, since Tseu-sse, had he been living, would have been more than a hundred years old when Mencius was born. It is, however, certain that he diligently studied the writings of Confucius, to the neglect of whose precepts he attributed the miserable state of things which he saw everywhere around him, faith and justice being disregarded, the bonds of society breaking asunder, and the whole empire hastening to decay. He resolved to devote his life to correcting these evils and restoring, so far as it lay in his power, the virtues of the primitive ages.

Although Mencius considered himself a follower of Confucius, yet in his mode of instruction, and especially in his behaviour towards those rulers who sought his counsel, he differed materially from his master. In his reasoning, if less grave than Confucius, he displayed more art and more acuteness. His method, indeed, was not unlike the dialectic of Socrates; he pushed his adversary from one admission to another, until he obliged him either to confess his defeat or else to maintain the most obvious and palpable absurdities. In his intercourse with kings he was more bold and severe than Confucius, both in exposing folly and denouncing injustice and oppression. Mencius appears to have been held in great respect by most of the Chinese princes to whom his fame had penetrated. It is not known at what time in his life he first began to teach publicly; but we are told that when he felt that he was sufficiently conversant with the doctrines and precepts of the great teachers of Chinese philosophy, he commenced his travels for the purpose of offering his counsels to the different petty sovereigns who ruled in the states adjacent or neighbouring to Loo. But, although he seems to have enjoyed more consideration than Confucius had done, he was scarcely more successful in carrying into practice his ideal plans of government. His theory of morals was too high and difficult for human nature in its ordinary condition. He appears not to have succeeded in a single instance in prevailing on any of the princes to embrace and consistently carry out his principles; and accordingly he had little inducement to continue at any of the courts longer than was necessary in order to make a fair trial of what his influence could effect. He is said to have passed the last twenty years of his life in the more congenial society of his disciples, and in writing those works by which he has perhaps exerted a greater influence on after-ages than he did upon that in which he lived. He is supposed to have died at an advanced age about 29c

B.C. According to Dr. Legge, he died 288 B.C.; some other authorities, however, place the date of his death many years earlier. The descendants of Mencius, like those of Confucius, constitute at the present day a class of what may be termed hereditary nobles,—the only hereditary nobility in China.

One of the chief doctrines of Mencius was that man is naturally good, although he admitted that by far the greater part of mankind had, through unfavourable circumstances or influences, become perverted. He says the way in which a man loses his natural goodness is like the way in which trees are deprived by the woodman of their branches and foliage. And if they still send forth some buds and sprouts, then come the cattle and goats and browse upon them. As in the tree all appearance of life and beauty is destroyed, so in man, after a long exposure to evil influences, all traces of native goodness seem to be obliterated. But he maintains that there is an original power of goodness in the race, and that all men may, if they will, become like Yao and Shun, two of the early sages and kings, who were pre-eminent for their virtue. A distinguished Chinese scholar says the great object of Mencius, in his writings, is to rectify men's hearts. "If a man once rectify his heart," says Mencius, "little else will remain for him to do." In another place he says, "The great or superior man is he who does not lose his child's heart," an expression which vividly recalls those beautiful lines of the great German poet,—

"Wohl dem der frei von Schuld und Fehle Bewahrt die kindlich reine Seele."*

It is evident, however, that, owing to his sanguine and ardent nature, or to some other cause, Mencius did not very fully realize the exceeding difficulty of "rectifying one's heart." Yet Confucius, who was regarded by Mencius as the most perfect of human beings, recognized this great but melancholy truth, when he said it was only at the age of seventy that "he could follow what his heart desired without transgressing what was right." ("Analects," book ii.)

Confucius had always inculcated the reciprocal obligation between kings and subjects. Mencius, without denying the general obligation of obedience on the part of subjects, taught nevertheless that among the various elements in a state "the people are the most important element, and the sovereign the least important;" and he did not hesitate to draw the legitimate inference from such a position that a bad sovereign ought to be dethroned, and even slain, if his life should endanger or in any way interfere with the public good.

The distinguished Orientalist Rémusat, in drawing a comparison between Confucius and Mencius, says the former "is always grave, and even austere; he exalts men of virtue of whom he presents an ideal portrait; he speaks of bad men only with a cool indignation. Mencius, with the same love of virtue, seems to feel for vice rather contempt than abhorrence. He assails it with the force of argument; he does not disdain to even employ against it the weapons of ridicule." Mencius combined a certain modesty with a just and manly appreciation of himself. He seemed greatly surprised when one of his disciples was disposed to rank him as a sage; yet he said on another occasion, "When sages shall rise up again, they will not change my words." He believed that he was appointed by Heaven to uphold or restore the doctrines of the ancient sages, such as Yao, Shun, and Confucius. Han-Yu, a celebrated Chinese critic, says, "If we wish to study the doctrines of the sages, we must begin with Mencius. . . . It is owing to his words that learners nowadays still know to revere Confucius, to honour benevolence and righteousness, to esteem the true sovereign, and to despise the mere pretender." We have already noticed some of the leading opinions of Mencius. The following are a few of his most characteristic sayings: "I love life; I also love righteousness. If I cannot keep both, I will let life go, and choose righteousness." (The Works of Mencius, book vi. chap. x.) "There is a nobility of Heaven, and there is a nobility of man. Benevolence, righteousness, self-consecration, and fidelity, with unwearied joy in these virtues,—these constitute the nobility of Heaven." (Book vi. chap. xvi.) "Benevolence subdues its opposite, just as water subdues fire. Those, however, who practise benevolence nowadays do it as if with one cup of water they could save a whole wagon-load of fuel on fire, and, when the flames are not extinguished, should say that water cannot subdue fire. This conduct, moreover, greatly encourages those who are not benevolent." (Book vi. chap. xviii.) "There is no greater delight than to be conscious of sincerity on self-examination." (Book vii. chap. iv.) Kung-Sun-Chow said to Mencius that his principles were admirable, but they were too difficult and lofty for ordinary minds, and asked him why he did not adapt his teachings to the capacity of the learners. He replied, "A great artificer does not, for the sake of a stupid workman, alter or do away with the marking-line." (Book vii. chap. xli.)

Mencke, (JOHANN BURKHARD,) born at Leipsic in 1675, became in 1708 historiographer to Frederick Augustus, King of Poland. He published, in Latin, "Two Orations on the Charlatanry of the Learned," (1715,) and a work entitled "Writers of German History," (3 vols., 1728–30.) The former caused a great sensation, and was translated into several foreign languages. Mencke also wrote a number of poems, and, after the death of his father, conducted the "Acta Eruditorum. Died in 1732. His son, FRIEDRICH OTTO MENCKE, (1708–1754,) was professor of history at Leipsic, and the author of various works.

Mencke, (OTTO,) a learned German, the father of the preceding, born at Oldenburg in 1644. He became professor of moral philosophy at Leipsic. In 1682 he founded the first literary and scientific journal published in Germany. It was entitled "Acta Eruditorum," and numbered among its contributors Leibnitz and other eminent savants. Died in 1707.

Mendaña de Neyra, mĕn-dän'yȧ dȧ nā'e-rȧ, (ALVARO,) a Spanish navigator, born in 1541, sailed on a voyage to the Pacific in 1567, and discovered between 7° and 12° south latitude the islands of Saint Christopher, Isabella, and Guadalcanar. He discovered in 1595 the isles since called by Admiral Byron the Dangerous Islands, and the large island of Santa Cruz, to which Carteret gave the name of Egmont in 1767. He also established a colony at Bahia Graciosa. The portion of Polynesia which includes the Marquesas has been named the Mendaña Archipelago. Died in 1595.

Men'deleëff, (DMITRI IVANOVICH,) a distinguished Russian chemist, born at Tobolsk in 1834 and made professor of chemistry in the University of St. Petersburg in 1866. Of his many discoveries the most notable is his periodic law of atomic weights, one of the leading chemical theories of the century.

Mendelssohn, mĕn'dĕls-sōn', (MOSES,) an eminent philosopher, born at Dessau, in Germany, in 1729, was the son of a Jewish schoolmaster. In consequence of the limited means of his family, he owed his early education chiefly to his own exertions. In 1745 he repaired to Berlin, where he applied himself to the study of mathematics and the philosophy of Wolf and Leibnitz. In 1754 he formed an intimate friendship with Lessing, in conjunction with whom he afterwards wrote the treatise entitled "Pope a Metaphysician." He next published his "Letters on the Sensations," and in 1767 his "Phædo, a Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul." The latter work was received with great favour, and was translated into the principal languages of Europe. Mendelssohn was one of the most profound thinkers of his time, and was highly esteemed by his contemporaries for the excellence of his character, as well as his intellectual endowments. Died in 1786.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, mĕn'dĕls-sōn' bar·tol'·dee, (FELIX,) an eminent German composer, born at Hamburg in 1809, was a grandson of the preceding. At an early age he manifested extraordinary musical talent, which received the most elaborate culture under Zelter and Ludwig Berger. He performed with brilliant success in Berlin and Paris before he had completed his tenth year, and in 1827 he brought out at Berlin his "Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream" and his opera of "The Wedding of Camacho." He subsequently visited London and Paris, where the "Overture" above named was received with enthusiasm. After his return to Germany, he was appointed, in 1835, director of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic. In 1836 he brought out his oratorio of "Saint Paul," at Dusseldorf and Leipsic, and the following year at Birmingham, England. His "Elijah," an oratorio, performed at the Birmingham Festival in 1846, caused a greater sensation in the musical world than had been known in England since the days of Handel. Subsequently, Mendelssohn's health, which had been some time declining, failed rapidly, and he died soon after his return to Germany, in November, 1847. Among the more important of his other compositions, we may name the overtures of "Fingal's Cave," "A Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," ("Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt,") and "The Beautiful Melusina," ("Die schöne Melusine,") besides a great number of cantatas and instrumental pieces. His "Songs without Words" are particularly admired. As a musician and composer, he is esteemed second only to Handel and Mozart.

Men'denhall, (THOMAS CORWIN,) an American educator, born at Hanoverton, Ohio, in 1841. He was professor of physics in the Imperial University of Japan 1878–81, president Rose Polytechnic Institute 1886–89, superintendent United States Coast and Geodetic Survey 1889–94, and became president of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute in 1894. In addition, he served the government in several capacities.

Mendès, (CATULLE,) a French poet, born at Bordeaux in 1840. His lyrical drama "Le Roman d'une Nuit" (1860) caused his imprisonment. Among his best works are "Hesperus," (1869, a fine poem with a Swedenborgian tone,) and "Le Soleil de Minuit," a dramatic poem. In 1866 he married JUDITH GAUTIER, (q.v.). He wrote several novels and plays, the latter including "Le Capitaine Fracasse," (1870,) "Le Châtiment," (1887,) and "Fiammette," (1889.)

Mendes Leal, mĕn'dĕs lā-ăl', (José da Silva,) a Portuguese poet, born in Lisbon, October 22, 1820. He held positions in the public service, and in 1874 was sent to France as minister plenipotentiary. His very popular "Poems" (1858) were followed by many plays and some romances. Died in 1886.

Mendoça or Mendoza, de, dā mĕn-do'sā, (ANDREA HURTADO,) a Portuguese naval commander, who rendered great services to his country by clearing the South Seas of pirates and thus protecting the Portuguese establishments in the East Indies. Died about 1606.

Mendoza, de, dā mĕn-do'thā, (ANTONIO HURTADO,) a Spanish writer, born about 1590, was appointed private secretary to Philip IV. He wrote a number of popular dramas, also lyric poems and prose works. Died in 1644.

See TICKNOR, "History of Spanish Literature."

Mendoza, de, (ANTONIO SARMIENTO,) a Spanish writer, a native of Burgos, lived about 1630. He translated Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" into Spanish.

Mendoza, de, (Don BERNARDINO,) a Spanish historian and diplomatist, was employed by Philip II. in several missions to France and England. He had a prominent share, while in France, in the formation of the Catholic League. He was the author of a "History of the Netherlands from 1567 to 1577," and a treatise "On the Theory and Practice of War."

See MOTLEY, "History of the United Netherlands," vol. i. chap iii.: CAPEFIGUE, "Histoire de la Réforme et la Ligue."

Mendoza, de, (DIEGO HURTADO,) a celebrated Spanish writer, soldier, and diplomatist, born at Granada in 1503, was a grandson of the Marquis de Santillana, noticed below. He studied at Salamanca, and distinguished himself by his attainments in the classics, theology, and civil and canon law. He was afterwards patronized by Charles V., who sent him in 1538 on an embassy to Venice. While in this post, he devoted himself to the collection of Greek and Latin manuscripts, of which he acquired a great number, comprising works of Saint Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Archimedes. They were subsequently ceded to the Library of the Escurial. He was soon after appointed by the emperor ambassador at Rome and governor of Sienna. Having returned to Spain in 1554, he incurred the displeasure of Philip II., who banished him from court. He devoted himself thenceforth to literary pursuits, and published in 1610 his "History of the Wars against the Moors," ("Guerra de Granada contra los Moriscos.") This work, which has taken its place among Spanish classics, is characterized by great accuracy and impartiality, and is esteemed the best imitation of the Latin historians in modern literature. He was also the author of a number of poems, and the celebrated comic romance of "Lazarillo de Tormes," (1554,) in which he originated the so-called Picaresque school of fiction, afterwards followed by Le Sage in his "Gil Blas." "Mendoza," says Prescott, "by the brilliant success which he achieved as a statesman, a diplomatist, a novelist, a poet, and a historian, has established a reputation for versatility of genius second to none in the literature of Spain." Died in 1575.

Mendoza, de, (JUAN GONZALEZ,) a Spanish missionary, born at Toledo about 1540. He visited China in 1580, and subsequently South America and Mexico. He died as Bishop of Popayan in New Granada, (1617.) He was the author of a "History of the Great Kingdom of China," (1586,) which enjoys a high reputation and has been translated into French.

Mendoza, de, (Don PEDRO,) a wealthy Spaniard, born at Cadiz about 1487. He offered his services, in 1529, to the emperor Charles V., to complete, at his own expense, the exploration of the rivers La Plata and Paraguay. Having been created by the emperor military chief of the country adjacent to those rivers, he set sail in 1534, and founded the city of Buenos Ayres in 1535. He died soon after, while at sea on his return to Spain.

Mendoza, de, (PEDRO GONZALEZ,) a Spanish prelate and statesman, called THE GRAND CARDINAL, born in 1428. He enjoyed the favour of John II. and Henry IV., and was created successively Bishop of Siguenza, Chancellor of Castile and Leon, and cardinal, (1473.) Under Ferdinand and Isabella he became Archbishop of Toledo. He also distinguished himself in the Moorish war, in which he held a command. He founded the magnificent College of Santa Cruz at Valladolid, and a hospital at Toledo. Died in 1495.

Mendoza, de, (PEDRO DE SALAZAR,) a Spanish historical writer, born at Toledo about 1550, published a "Chronicle of the House of Ponce de Leon," (1620,) and a "Chronicle of the Grand Cardinal of Spain, Pedro Gonzalez de Mendoza," (1625.) Died in 1629.

Men-e-de'mus, [Gr. Μενέδημος; Fr. MÉNÉDÈME, mà'nà'dàm',] a Greek philosopher, born at Eretria in the fourth century B.C. He was the founder of the school of Eretria, and was a disciple of Plato and Stilpo. Died about 277 B.C.

Ménélas. See MENELAUS.

Men-e-lā'us, [Gr. Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλας; Fr. MÉNÉLAS, mà'nà'lâs',] a Grecian hero and king of Sparta, was a son of Atreus. He and his brother Agamemnon were called Atridæ. He married the beautiful Helen, who preferred him to all of her numerous suitors, but afterwards eloped with Paris. At the siege of Troy, which was the consequence of the abduction of Helen, Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage, and fought a single combat with Paris, whom he was about to vanquish, when Venus interposed and rescued him. He was one of the daring band that entered Troy in the wooden horse. On the capture of Troy he recovered Helen, was reconciled to her, and, after a devious voyage of several years, returned to Sparta. A temple was erected in his honour at Therapne.

Menelaus, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer of Alexandria, resided in Rome under the reign of Trajan. His only extant work is a treatise on spherical geometry, which was translated into Latin.

Men'elik II., King of Abyssinia, was born in 1843, and succeeded to the crown in 1889, on the death of John II. In the same year he concluded a treaty which placed his kingdom under an Italian protectorate. Disputes concerning the text of the treaty arising, hostilities broke out, which ended in the complete defeat of the Italians and the freeing of the kingdom from foreign influence. Menelik endeavoured to promote the civilization of his people, and cultivated relations with foreign powers.

Me-ne'nI-us A-grip'pa, surnamed LANA'TUS, a Roman patrician and senator, was chosen consul in 503 B.C. He obtained a signal victory over the Sabines, for which a triumph was decreed him. Through his mediation the contest between the patricians and the plebeians was appeased in 493. On this occasion he related the fable of the belly and the members to the plebeians.

Me-nep'thah II., a king of Egypt, of the nineteenth dynasty, was the son and successor of Rameses II. He gained a great victory over the Greeks and Libyans, probably in what is now called Barca, and reigned thirty years with great dignity. His son, Menepthah III., is said to have been at first a viceroy of Ethiopia under the usurping Sipthah, or pseudo-Menepthah, whom he deposed. After this he reigned for many years at Thebes. He was the last king of his dynasty.

Me'nēs [Gr. Μήνης, or Μῆνις] was the first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of that country. He is said to have founded Memphis, and to have introduced the worship of the gods. He lived probably 2000 B.C., or earlier.

Meneses or Menezes, mà-nā'sĕs, (ALEIXO,) a Portuguese prelate, born at Lisbon in 1559, became Archbishop of Goa, and in 1607 succeeded Alphonso de Castro as Viceroy of the Indies. He was appointed by Philip III. of Spain Viceroy of Portugal in 1614. Died in 1617.

Meneses Osorio, mà-nā'sĕs o-so're-o, (FRANCISCO,) a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1630, was one of the most distinguished pupils of Murillo. Among his master-pieces are "Saint Philip de Neri adoring the Virgin," and "Saint Catherine." Died in 1705.

Menesthée. See MENESTHEUS.

Me-nĕs'theŭs, [Gr. Μενεσθεύς; Fr. MÉNESTHÉE, mà'nĕs'tà',] a semi-fabulous king of Athens, obtained the throne in the absence of Theseus, who was the lawful monarch. He commanded the Athenians in the Trojan war.

Menestheus, [Μενεσθεύς,] an able Athenian general, was a son of Iphicrates. He was appointed commander in the Social war, 356 B.C. He also commanded a naval expedition against the Macedonians in 335 B.C.

Menestrier, mẹh-nĕs'tRe-à', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) a learned French ecclesiastic and antiquary, born at Lyons in 1631. He was the author of numerous treatises on heraldry, antiquities, and history, among which we may name "On Ancient and Modern Chivalry," (1673,) "The Origin of Armorial Bearings," (1679,) and "The Philosophy of Images," (2 vols., 1682–83.) Died in 1705.

Menestrier, Le, lẹh mẹh-nĕs'tRe-à', (CLAUDE,) a French antiquary, whose principal work is entitled "Statue of the Symbolical Ephesian Diana Explained." Died in 1639.

Menestrier, Le, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French antiquary, born at Dijon in 1564, was the author of a work entitled "Medals, Coins, and Antique Monuments of the Roman Empresses," (1625.) Died in 1634.

Méneval, de, dẹh mà'nà'vàl', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) BARON, a French historian, born in Paris in 1778. During the empire he served Napoleon as secretary, (secrétaire du portefeuille.) He wrote "Napoléon et Marie Louise, Souvenirs historiques," (3 vols., 1843–45.) Died in 1850.

Mengoli, mĕn'go-lee, (PIETRO,) an Italian geometer, born at Bologna in 1625; died in 1686.

Mengs, mĕngs, (ANTON RAFAEL,) a celebrated German painter, born at Aussig, in Bohemia, in 1728. He was instructed by his father, with whom he resided several years at Rome. On his return to Germany he was appointed court painter at Dresden, in 1744. While on a second visit to Rome, he painted a "Holy Family," which won for him a high reputation. The Madonna in this picture was the portrait of a beautiful peasant-girl, whom Mengs afterwards married, having become a Catholic for her sake. He became in 1754 director of the Academy of Painting at Rome, and in 1757 he executed his celebrated fresco of "Apollo and the Muses" in the villa of Cardinal Albani On the invitation of Charles III. of Spain, he repaired to Madrid, where he was appointed first painter to the king, with a large salary. Here he produced several of his master-pieces, among which we may name his "Temple of Glory" and "Triumph of Trajan" in the royal palace. He died at Rome in 1779. Mengs is ranked among the best painters of his time, his works being distinguished by great accuracy of design and neatness of execution, but they are censured by critics as deficient in warmth and animation.

Mer'cu-rỹ, [Lat. MERCU'RIUS; Fr. MERCURE, mĕR'kür'; It. MERCURIO, mĕR-koo're-o; Ger. MERCUR, mĕR-koor',] in the Roman mythology, a god of commerce and gain, (from the Latin merx, plural merces, "merchandise,") was regarded as the messenger of the gods, the patron of orators, merchants, travellers, and thieves. He was identified by the Romans of the later ages with the Greek Hermes, and was said to be a son of Jupiter and Maia. The poets feigned that it was his office to conduct the souls of the dead to the infernal regions,—that he stole from Neptune his trident, from Venus her girdle, from Mars his sword, and from Jupiter his sceptre,—that he could assume whatever shape he pleased, and render himself invisible. Having invented the lyre and given it to Apollo, he received from that god a golden wand, called caduceus. The invention of the alphabet, of numbers, of astronomy, of music, and other things, was ascribed to Mercury, who was also interested in alliances and treaties. He was represented with a winged cap (petasus) and winged sandals, (talaria.) He received numerous surnames, among which are Cyllenius, (from Mount Cyllene, where he was born,) Caduceator, (i.e. the "herald" or "wand-bearer,") Argeiphontes, (the "slayer of Argus,") and many other names.

In 1848 he was appointed minister of war in the Hungarian cabinet of Batthyányi, but on the breaking out of the war joined the revolutionary party. After sharing with Dembinski the defeat of Temesvar, he took refuge in Turkey, and afterwards visited England and America. Died in 1858.

Métastase. See METASTASIO.

Metastasio, mā-tās-tä'se-o, [Fr. MÉTASTASE, mā'tās'-tāz',] (PIETRO BONAVENTURA,) an eminent Italian poet, born at Rome in 1698, was originally named TRAPASSI. He manifested at an early age extraordinary talents for improvisation on any subject. Having attracted the notice of the celebrated jurist Gravina, he was adopted by him, and his name was changed to Metastasio, (a "changing,") in allusion to his adoption. His benefactor died in 1718, leaving his property to Metastasio, who now devoted himself principally to literary pursuits, and brought out in 1721 his lyric drama entitled "The Gardens of the Hesperides," ("Gli Orti Esperidi.") This piece was received with great favour, one of the principal parts in it being performed by Signora Bulgarini, (La Romanina,) esteemed the first vocalist of her time. At the request of this lady, he relinquished the legal profession, which he had practised for a time, and gave his attention exclusively to poetry. His opera of "Didone Abbandonata" was performed with great applause at Naples in 1724, and was followed by his "Catone," "Semiramide," "Artaserse," and other operas, which established his reputation. On the invitation of the emperor Charles VI., he repaired to Vienna, and succeeded Apostolo Zeno as imperial laureate. In 1734 he lost his "inestimable counsellor and friend," Signora Bulgarini, who bequeathed to him, after the death of her husband, her property, amounting to twenty-five thousand crowns. This, with characteristic delicacy, he refused to accept. He brought out during his residence at Vienna two of his most admired operas, the "Olimpiade" and "La Clemenza di Tito," which the music of Mozart has contributed to render immortal. Besides the works above named, he composed a number of oratorios, cantatas, sonnets, etc. He died at Vienna in 1782. The genius of Metastasio is eulogized by Voltaire and La Harpe, the former of whom compares some of his scenes to the most sublime of the Greek poets. Rousseau, in his "Nouvelle Héloïse," pronounces him "the only poet of the heart, the only genius who can move by the charm of poetic and musical harmony;" and Schlegel observes that his purity of diction, grace, and delicacy have rendered him in the eyes of his countrymen a classic author,—the Racine of Italy.

He edited and adapted Becker's "Gallus" (1844; revised edition, 1884) and "Charicles," (1845, 1884,) and wrote a "History of German Literature," and accounts of his travels in Norway, Thelemarken, and Iceland, ("The Oxonian in Norway," etc., 1856, 1858, 1861.) Died in 1885.

Met'calfe, (THOMAS,) an American Whig statesman, born in Fauquier county, Virginia, in 1780, removed at an early age to Kentucky. He worked at the trade of stone-mason in his youth. He became Governor of Kentucky in 1828, and filled that office four years. In 1848 he succeeded Mr. Crittenden in the United States Senate. His term expired in March, 1849. Died in 1855.

Metch'nikoff, (ELIAS,) a Russian zoologist, was born in the government of Kharkoff in 1845, and became a professor at Odessa in 1870. He advanced a theory that old age is due to the destruction of the vital cells of the body by the white blood-corpuscles, and suggested the use of a serum prepared from young animals to give new vitality to the body.

Metelli. See METELLI.

Me-tel'lus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS,) called MACEDO'NICUS, an eminent Roman general, of a noble family, was chosen prætor in 148 B.C. He gained a victory over the Macedonians in that year, and took their leader, Andriscus, prisoner, for which a triumph was decreed him. In 146 he defeated the Achæans near Thermopylæ. He was made consul in 143, and was sent to Spain to oppose Viriathus. It was during the censorship of Metellus and Pompeius (131 B.C.) that the decree was passed obliging all Roman citizens to marry. He opposed the Gracchi. Died in 115 B.C.

See TACITUS, "Annales;" LIVY, "Epitome."

Metellus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS NUMIDICUS,) an able Roman general, a nephew of the preceding, was a leader of the aristocratic party. Having been chosen consul for 109 B.C., he obtained as his province Numidia, then the seat of war with Jugurtha, who had hitherto succeeded in outgeneralling or outwitting all the Roman commanders sent against him. Metellus was more successful, and finally gained a great victory over the African prince at the river Muthul, towards the close of that year. Before the end of this war the command was transferred to Marius; but Metellus was honoured with a triumph on his return to Rome in 107, and received the surname of NUMID'ICUS. He became censor in 102, and was banished about 100 B.C., through the influence of Marius and Saturninus, but he was recalled the next year. He was distinguished as an orator, and was reputed one of the most virtuous men of his time.

See SALLUST, "Bellum Jugurthinum;" PLUTARCH, "Marius."

Metellus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS PIUS,) a Roman general, a son of the preceding, became prætor in 89 B.C. In the civil war between Marius and Sulla he fought for the latter, and gained a decisive victory over Carbo and Norbanus, near Faventia, in 82 B.C. He was chosen consul with Sulla in the year 80, after which he commanded in Spain and spent several years in unsuccessful efforts to conquer Sertorius. He became pontifex maximus. Died about 63 B.C.

Me-tel'lus Ce'ler, (Q. CÆCILIUS,) a Roman statesman, and leader of the aristocratic party. He became prætor in 63 B.C., acted with Cicero against Catiline, and was chosen consul for the year 60. During his consulship he resolutely opposed the laws which his colleague Afranius desired to enact for the benefit of Pompey. Died in 59 B.C.

Me-tel'lus Ne'pos, (QUINTUS,) a brother of the preceding, became tribune of the people in 63 B.C., and was a partisan of Pompey. As tribune, he opposed Cicero with some violence. He became prætor in 60, and consul in 57 B.C. Died about 55 B.C.

Meteren, van, vän mā'tẹh-rẹn, (EMANUEL,) a Flemish Protestant historian, born at Antwerp in 1535, was the author of a "History of the Netherlands from the Early Part of the Sixteenth Century to his Own Time," (in Latin and Flemish.) It is valued for its accuracy; but the historian is accused by some writers of injustice towards the Catholics. Died in 1612.

Metternich, von, fon met'tẹr-nĪK', (CLEMENS WENZEL,) PRINCE, an eminent Austrian statesman and diplomatist, born at Coblentz in 1773, was a son of Count Metternich, who was a minister of state at Vienna and died in 1818. He was sent as minister to Dresden in 1801, and to Berlin in 1803. In 1806 he became ambassador to Paris, where he remained until the renewal of the war in 1809. After the capture of Vienna and the restoration of peace, he was appointed chancellor and minister of foreign affairs, October, 1809. For more than thirty years from that date he had the chief direction of affairs in Austria. He represented his government at the Congress of Vienna, (1814,) after which he had great influence in European politics. "No diplomatist," says Alison, "even in that age of intellectual giants, excelled, perhaps hardly any equalled, Metternich in the sagacious survey which he took of existing events, and the admirable tact with which he contrived to render them conducive to the interests of his country." ("History of Europe.") In politics he was extremely conservative. He was driven from power and into exile by the revolution of March, 1848. He returned to Vienna in 1851. Died in 1859. "He always comprehended his position," says the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1858, "and never lost an opportunity. He acted with equal justice and calculation, and never made a retrograde step. His conduct was always politic, and never precipitate." "The Memoirs of Prince Metternich," edited by his son, appeared in 1879.

Metternich, von, (RICHARD CLEMENT JOSEPH HERMANN,) PRINCE, an Austrian diplomatist, a son of the preceding, was born June 7, 1829. He became secretary of legation at Paris in 1854. In 1859, before the Italian war broke out, he was intrusted with a special mission to Paris, and from the close of the war until 1871 he was ambassador at the French court. He was named hereditary councillor of the Austrian empire in 1861, and councillor in 1864. Died March 1, 1895.

His principal work is a "Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour, with Special Reference to England from the Norman Conquest to the Time of Charles II.," (1824,) which is highly esteemed. He was knighted in 1832. Died in 1848.

Mézeray, de, deh màz'rà', (FRANÇOIS EUDES,) a French historian, born in Lower Normandy in 1610, was patronized by Cardinal Richelieu. His principal work is a "History of France," (3 vols., 1651,) which enjoyed extraordinary popularity at the time, owing in great part to the engraved portraits it contained. He succeeded Voiture as a member of the French Academy in 1649, and became perpetual secretary of that institution in 1675. He was also historiographer of France. Died in 1683.

Meziriac, de, deh meh-ze're'ăk', (CLAUDE GASPAR BACHET,) a French scholar and mathematician, born at Bourg-en-Bresse in 1581. He published an edition of the "Arithmetic" of Diophantus, (with notes,) and translated a number of Ovid's "Epistles" into French verse. Died in 1638.

Mezzofanti, mẽt-so-fän'tee, (GIUSEPPE GASPARO,) a celebrated Italian linguist, born at Bologna in 1774. He studied at the episcopal seminary of his native city, and was ordained a priest in 1797. In 1804 he became professor of Greek and the Oriental languages at Bologna, and in 1815 was appointed chief librarian of the university. Distinguished foreigners who visited Bologna at this time praised his extraordinary attainments and bore witness to the accuracy with which he spoke their respective languages. On the invitation of Pope Gregory XVI., he repaired in 1831 to Rome, where he succeeded Angelo Mai as keeper of the Vatican Library, and in 1838 was made a cardinal. A German scholar says of him at this period, "He is familiar not only with the principal European languages, but with the Irish, Welsh, and even Lappish." He is said to have spoken upwards of fifty languages, and was thoroughly versed in the idioms and provincialisms peculiar to each: he could entertain his English friends with specimens of Yorkshire dialect, and his French or German visitors with the patois of their respective countries. Lord Byron styles Mezzofanti a prodigy of languages, who should have lived in the times of the tower of Babel, to serve as a universal interpreter. Died in 1849.

Miazzi, me-ät'see, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian architect, born at Bérgamo in 1699. Among his most admired works are the theatre at Treviso and the Spineda palace at Venegazza. Died about 1780.

Mī'cah, [Heb. מִיכָה; Fr. MICHÉE, me'shā',] one of the minor Hebrew prophets, was contemporary with Isaiah and Hosea, and flourished under the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, from 759 to 699 B.C. "His style," says Bishop Lowth, "is in many parts animated and sublime, and in general truly poetical."

Mical, me'kăl', (N.) an ingenious French mechanician, born about 1730, constructed several admirable automatons, among which were two speaking heads, presented by him to the Academy of Sciences in 1783. Died about 1790.

See "Mémoires secrets."

Micali, me-kā'lee, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian historian and antiquary, born at Leghorn about 1780. His principal work is entitled "Italy before the Dominion of the Romans," (4 vols., 1810.) Died in 1844.

Mī'cha-ęl, [Heb. מִיכָאֵל; Gr. Μιχαήλ; Fr. MICHEL, me'shĕl'; It. MICHELE, me-kā'lā,] one of the archangels mentioned in the Old Testament, was regarded as the especial protector of the Jewish nation. A festival was instituted in his honour, as a defender of the Church, by the Christians of the ninth century, which is still celebrated on the 29th of September, (Michaelmas Day.)

See Daniel x. 13-21; Revelation xii. 7-9.

Mī'cha-ęl [Gr. Μιχαήλ; Fr. MICHEL, me'shĕl'; It. MICHELE, me-kā'lā] I., Emperor of the East, surnamed RHANGABE, (ὁ Ῥαγγάβη,) succeeded, in 811 A.D., Stauracius, whose sister Procopia he had married. Being unsuccessful in his war against the Bulgarians, he abdicated his crown in 813 and retired to a convent. Died about 845.

See LE BEAU, "Histoire du Bas-Empire."

Michael II., THE STAMMERER, also called MICHAEL THE PHRYGIAN, succeeded Leo the Armenian, whom he had caused to be assassinated, as Emperor of Constantinople, in 820 A.D. He died after a reign of nine years, leaving the empire to his son Theophilus.

Michael III., Emperor of the East, a son of Theophilus, ascended the throne in 842 A.D., when he was about three years old. He was assassinated by Basil the Macedonian in 867. His character was very depraved.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Michael IV., surnamed THE PAPHLAGONIAN, [Gr. Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παφλαγών,] became emperor in 1034, having previously married Zoe, widow of Romanus III., whom she had put to death. He died in 1041, and was succeeded by his nephew, Michael Calaphates.

Michael V., surnamed CALAPHATES, [Gr. ὁ Καλαφατης,] was made Emperor of the East in 1041, but he was deposed by his subjects in 1042.

Michael VI, Emperor of the East, surnamed STRATIOT'ICUS, began to reign in 1056. He was deposed in 1057, and was succeeded by Isaac Comnenus.

Michael VII., surnamed PARAPINA'CES, a son of Constantine XI., succeeded Romanus III. in 1071. He was feeble and incompetent to reign, and he abdicated in 1078.

Michael VIII. Palæol'ogus, [Gr. Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παλαιολόγος; Fr. MICHEL PALÉOLOGUE, me'shĕl' pă'lā'o'log',] Emperor of the East, and a son of Andron'icus Palæologus, was born in 1224. He usurped in 1260 the throne of John Lascaris, the infant heir of the late Emperor of Nicæa. In 1261 his army took Constantinople from the Latin ruler, Baldwin II. He was excommunicated by the Patriarch Arsenius for his cruel treatment of John Lascaris, whom he deprived of sight. Under his auspices the Eastern and Western Churches made a treaty of union in 1274; but this attempt to restore the union proved abortive. In 1281 he defeated the army which Charles of Anjou and the pope sent to invade the Eastern empire. He died in 1282, and was succeeded by his son, Andron'icus II.

Mī'cha-ęl An'gę-lo [Fr. MICHEL-ANGE, me'shĕl' ŏnzh; It. MICHELANGELO, me-kĕl-ân'jà-lo; Lat. MICHAEL AN'GELUS] Buonarotti (boo-o-nâ-rot'tee) or Buonarroti, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was born in the castle of Caprese, in Tuscany, on the 6th of March, 1474. He was descended from the noble family of Canossa. At the time of his birth, his father, Lodovico Buonarotti Simone, was podesta or governor of Chiusi and Caprese. His mother's name was Francesca del Sera. He attended a grammar-school in Florence, and became in 1488 a pupil of Domenico Ghirlandaio. Soon after that date he began to study sculpture in an academy, or garden, which Lorenzo the Magnificent had furnished with antique statues and bas-reliefs, in Florence. He gained the favour of Lorenzo, who about 1490 invited him to become an inmate of his palace and treated him with much respect and kindness. Here he enjoyed the society of eminent literary men, one of whom, Angelo Poliziano, (Politian,) became his intimate friend. Among his earliest works was a marble bas-relief, the subject of which was "The Battle of Hercules with the Centaurs." This work, which was approved by his own mature judgment, is preserved in Florence. His patron, Lorenzo de' Medici, died in 1492, and was succeeded by his degenerate son Piero, by whose order Michael Angelo made a colossal statue of snow. In 1494 he went to Bologna, where he worked about a year. Having returned to Florence, he executed a statue of a "Sleeping Cupid," which some person passed off as an antique and sold for a high price to Cardinal San Giorgio. About 1497 he produced an admirable marble group, called a "Pietà," representing "The Virgin weeping over the Dead Body of her Son." "In none of his works," says Ernest Breton, "has he displayed more perfect knowledge of design and anatomy, or more profound truth of expression." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") This group now adorns a chapel in the church of Saint Peter at Rome. He found another patron in Pietro Soderini, the gonfaloniere (chief ruler) of Florence, who employed him in sculpture and painting. He executed a gigantic marble statue of the psalmist David, which stands in front of the Palazzo Vecchio, in Florence. He received four hundred ducats for this work, on which he spent about eighteen months and which he finished in 1504. Having been commissioned by Soderini to paint in fresco a historical picture in the hall of the ducal palace, he chose for his subject an event in the war between the Florentines and the people of Pisa. He displayed in the cartoon of this composition a grandeur of style and a knowledge of anatomy which had not been equalled by any modern painter. "Such was the excellence of this work," says Vasari, "that some thought it absolute perfection." This cartoon has perished, and the painting itself was never begun. Among his early paintings is an oil-picture of the "Holy Family," (about 1504.) He was invited to Rome by Julius II. soon after the accession of that pontiff, who employed him to build his monument or mausoleum. He formed a magnificent design for this work, which design was approved by the pope and has been described by Vasari, but was never completely executed. While they were consulting about a suitable place for the monument, the architect, San Gallo, suggested that a new chapel ought to be built expressly for so superb a mausoleum. The pope concurred in his opinion, and determined to rebuild the church of Saint Peter. Thus Michael Angelo's design is said to have been the cause of the erection of the most magnificent church in the world. In 1506 he was offended at the pope because he was not admitted to his presence when he went to the palace on business. He therefore abruptly quitted his service, and retired to Florence. Julius II. sent messengers to bring him back, but he refused to return, until the pope had urged him by several letters and mandates. Michael Angelo wished to finish the monument which he had begun, but Julius had changed his mind, and ordered the great artist to decorate with frescos the ceiling and walls of the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican. He painted in the Sistine Chapel numerous scenes from the book of Genesis, and colossal figures of prophets and sibyls. "From the commencement," says Duppa, "to the conclusion of this stupendous monument of human genius, twenty months only were employed. So short a time for the completion of so vast a work could hardly be credited, if it were not more difficult to refuse the testimony on which it is supported." It was finished in 1512. Michael Angelo and Raphael worked in the Vatican at the same time.

Julius II. died in 1513, and was succeeded by Leo X., who is censured for his illiberal conduct towards Michael Angelo. Leo ordered him to build the façade of the church of San Lorenzo at Florence, and compelled him against his will to spend several years in procuring marble for that purpose. "It is a mortifying reflection," says Duppa, "that the talents of this great man should have been buried and his time consumed, during the whole reign of Leo X., in little else than in raising stone out of a quarry and making a road to convey it to the sea." ("Life of M. Angelo.") Under the patronage of Clement VII., who was elected pope in 1523, he began to build the library and chapel of San Lorenzo, at Florence. He erected fortifications at Florence in 1528 or 1529, and aided in the defence of that city against the papal troops. After the accession of Pope Paul III., in 1534, Michael Angelo was permitted to resume the monument of Julius II., which he completed on a smaller scale than that which he first designed. It consists of seven statues, one of which represents Moses, and was placed in the church of San Pietro in Vinculo. This statue of Moses is called one of his master-pieces.

Among his greatest productions is a picture, in fresco, of "The Last Judgment," in the Sistine Chapel, Rome. This work, which occupied him about eight years and comprises nearly three hundred figures, was finished in 1541. It presents a confused mass of naked bodies in the most violent attitudes and most admired disorder, and excels chiefly in energy of expression. "In the 'Last Judgment,'" says E. Breton, "one will seek in vain for that celestial light and divine inspiration which appear in the 'Transfiguration,'" (of Raphael.)

In 1546 he was appointed architect of Saint Peter's Church, which Julius II. began to build about 1506. Michael Angelo accepted this appointment on the conditions that he should receive no salary, and that he should deviate from the design of San Gallo, the former architect of the church. He adopted a more simple design, formed a model for the dome, and devoted the remainder of his life chiefly to that grand fabric, but did not live to see it completed. He finished the Farnese palace, which is greatly admired, and is one of the most imposing edifices of modern Rome. In his latter years he adorned the Capitoline Hill with several fine buildings, among which is the senatorial palace. He was the author of numerous sonnets and other poems, which are distinguished for elegance and purity of style. These were published in 1538, and often reprinted. He never married. He died in Rome in February, 1563, or, according to some authorities, in 1564. His moral character is represented as good.

"He was the bright luminary," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "from whom painting has borrowed a new lustre, under whose hands it assumed a new appearance and became another and superior art, and from whom all his contemporaries and successors have derived whatever they have possessed of the dignified and majestic." ("Discourses on Painting," vol. ii.) Comparing him with Raphael, Quatremère de Quincy remarks, "If Michael Angelo is the greatest of draughtsmen, Raffaello is the first of painters." ("Life of Raffaello.") "In painting," says Duppa, "the great work on which Michael Angelo's fame depends, and, taking it for all in all, the greatest work of his whole life, is the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. . . . His Sibyls and prophets exhibit with variety and energy the colossal powers of his mind. . . . In his great works, his superior abilities are shown in the sublimity of his conceptions and the power and facility with which they are executed." It is doubtful whether any oil-painting by this artist is now extant.

Michaud, mē'shō', (CLAUDE IGNACE FRANÇOIS,) an able French general, born near the Jura Mountains in 1753. He became general of division in 1793, and in 1794 succeeded Pichegru as commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine. In the same year he gained victories at Kaiserslautern, Mannheim, and other places. From 1806 to 1813 he was Governor of the Hanse towns. Died in 1835.

Michaud, (JOSEPH FRANÇOIS,) a distinguished French writer and journalist, born in Savoy in 1767. Soon after the breaking out of the French Revolution he repaired to Paris, where he was associate editor for many years of the royalist journals the "Gazette Française" and 'La Quotidienne." In 1811 he began, in conjunction with his brother, the publication of the celebrated "Biographie Universelle," (completed in 1840, 85 vols. 8vo,) which numbered among its contributors the most eminent literary and scientific men of France. Michaud was the author of an excellent "History of the Crusades," (6 vols., 1841,) a poem entitled "The Spring-Time of an Exile," which had great popularity, and other works in prose and verse, besides a number of contributions to the "Biographie Universelle." He was for many years a prominent bookseller and publisher in Paris. Died in 1839.

Michaud, (LOUIS GABRIEL,) a French littérateur, born at Bourg-en-Bresse in 1772. He was a brother of the preceding, in conjunction with whom he established a printing-house in Paris, from which issued the principal royalist publications of the time. He was the author of a "Historical Picture of the First Wars of Napoleon Bonaparte," "History of Saint-Simonism," etc., and made numerous contributions to the "Biographie Universelle." Died in 1858.

Michault, mē'shō', (JEAN BERNARD,) a French philologist and bibliographer, born at Dijon in 1707; died in 1770.

Michaux, mē'shō', (ANDRÉ,) a distinguished French botanist and traveller, born at Versailles in 1746. After having traversed Persia and other countries, he was sent by the government to North America in 1785 for the purpose of collecting trees and plants. For about eleven years he thoroughly explored the botanical productions of the United States, Canada, etc., with a courage and energy which no danger or difficulty could overcome. In 1796 he returned to France with his collections, and prepared his "Description of the Oaks of North America," (1801.) He accompanied Baudin's scientific expedition to Australia in 1800, and, while pursuing his researches in Madagascar, he died of fever in 1802. He left a "Flora of North America," ("Flora Boreali-Americana," 2 vols., 1803,) which for many years was the most complete that had appeared. Both of his works are adorned with excellent engravings by Redouté.

Michelet, mēsh'lȧ', (JULES,) an eminent French historian, born in Paris in 1798. He was chosen chief of the historical department of the archives of France in 1830, before which he had published several historical works for schools. About 1832 he was appointed the substitute or successor of Guizot as professor of history at the Sorbonne. He published in 1831 a "Roman History: the Republic," and in 1833 the first volume of his "History of France." In 1838 he obtained the chair of history and moral science in the College of France, and was elected a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. He distinguished himself as an adversary of the Jesuits and of Romanism. After the coup-d'état of December, 1851, refusing to take the oath, he lost his place in the archives, and his chair in the College of France. His principal works are a "History of the French Revolution," (7 vols., 1847–53,) a "History of France," (14 vols., 1833–62,) "Love." ("L'Amour," 1858,) and "Woman," ("La Femme," 1859.) These have been translated into English and often reprinted. His histories present a profusion of poetical images, with a brilliant style and ingenious generalizations. He also wrote "A Sketch (Précis) of Modern History," (1833,) "The Sea," ("La Mer," 1861,) "The Bible of Humanity," ("La Bible de l'Humanité," 1864,) and two posthumous works, "The Soldiers of the Revolution," (1878,) and "The Banquet," (1879.) Died at the Iles d'Hyères, February 10, 1874.

Michiels, me'she·ẹl', (JOSEPH ALFRED XAVIER,) a French littérateur, born at Rome in 1813. He published a "History of Flemish and Dutch Painting," "History of the Franco-Prussian War," etc. Died in 1892.

Mi-çip'sa, [Gr. Μικίψας,] King of Numidia, was a son of Masinissa, at whose death, in 148 B.C., the kingdom was divided between Micipsa and his brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal. After the death of these two, who survived their father but a short time, he was king of all Numidia. He was an ally of the Romans. Died in 118 B.C.

Mickiewicz, mĭts-ke-ā'vitch, (ADAM,) a celebrated Polish poet, born in Lithuania in 1798. He studied at the University of Wilna, where he became intimate with several distinguished patriots and joined the secret societies opposed to the Russian government. He published in 1822 a collection of poems, which at once established his reputation as the greatest poet his country had produced. He was banished in 1824 to the interior of Russia, on a charge of conspiring against the government, and while residing at Odessa wrote his "Crimean Sonnets." Having been permitted to leave Russia, in 1828 he visited Germany and Rome, and in 1834 took up his residence in Paris. He was appointed in 1840 professor of the Slavonic language and literature in the College of France, where he lectured for a time with great success. His subsequent connection with the Polish fanatic Towianski, who inculcated the worship of Napoleon Bonaparte, deprived him of his popularity and he was ordered to quit Paris by the government. He was sent by Louis Napoleon on a mission to Constantinople in 1855, and died soon after his arrival. His principal works are his "Grajina," a historic picture of Lithuania in early times, "Konrad Wallenrod," (1830,) the "Ancestors," ("Dziady," 1832,)—in the first part of which he gives the story of his unfortunate attachment to the sister of a fellow-student, and in the latter describes his imprisonment at Wilna,—and "Pan Tadeusz," (1833.)

Mickle or Meikle, mĭk'ẹl, (WILLIAM JULIUS,) a Scottish poet and translator, born in Dumfriess-shire in 1734. Having visited London in 1763, he published several poems, which obtained for him the patronage of Lord Lyttleton, and in 1775 brought out his translation of the "Lusiad" of Camoens. It had great popularity in England, and procured for him the honour of admission to the Royal Academy of Lisbon. This work, however, is far from being a faithful version of the original; and Hallam observes that Mickle's "infidelities in translation exceed all liberties ever taken in this way.' He also published several popular ballads, one of which, entitled "Cumnor Hall," suggested to Sir Walter Scott his romance of "Kenilworth." Died in 1788.

Micklucho-Maclay, mik-loo'ko-mạ-klī', (NIKOLAS,) a Russian traveller, born in 1846, was the son of a nobleman. He studied at the University of Saint Petersburg. In 1866 he went with Haeckel to Madeira, in 1867 to the Canaries, and in 1869 to Morocco. After visiting South America, Tahiti, and Samoa, he in 1871–72 made the first of his celebrated journeys in Papua. He also travelled in Indo-China and in other little-known regions, making important geographical discoveries. Died 1888.

Mī'con, [Gr. Μίκων,] an eminent Athenian painter and sculptor, flourished about the middle of the fifth century B.C. He was chosen by his countrymen to paint the walls of the temple of Theseus at Athens. His pictures representing the battles of the Amazons and Centaurs were especially admired for the skill displayed in the delineation of the horses. There were several other Greek artists named Micon.

Micrelius or Micrælius, me-krā'le-ŭs, (JOHANN,) a German historical writer, born at Cöslin in 1597. He taught philosophy at Stettin, and published, besides other works, "Lexicon Philosophicum," (1653,) and "Royal Political Science," ("Regia Politica Scientia." 1654.) Died in 1658.

Mī'das, [Gr. Μίδας,] a Phrygian king, who, according to tradition, requested of Bacchus that all he touched might turn to gold, and was gratified by the grant of that wish. Being thus in danger of starvation, he could only escape the curse he had brought upon himself by bathing in the Pactolus, which ever after flowed with sands of gold. It is also related of him that, having decided in favour of Pan in his musical contest with Apollo, Midas's ears were changed to those of an ass, which he endeavoured to conceal. They were at length discovered by a servant, who, unable to retain the secret, whispered it in a pit in the ground, and the reeds which grew around the spot revealed his disgrace, murmuring in the winds the words, "King Midas has asses' ears." This fable was a favourite theme with the Athenian dramatists.

Middelburg, de, deh mid'dĕl-bŭrH', (PAUL,) a Dutch mathematician and writer, born at Middelburg in 1445, became professor of mathematics at Padua. He was made Bishop of Fossombrone in 1494. Died in 1534.

Mid'dendorf, von, (ALEXANDER THEODOR,) a Russian explorer, born at St. Petersburg in 1815. He was educated in Russia and Germany, became a professor in Kiev University, and later a geographical explorer in Siberia. He was many years in working out the scientific results of his explorations, and published a number of scientific works. He studied also the agriculture of Turkestan. Died in 1894.

Middendorp, van, vän mid'den-dorp', (JAKOB,) a Dutch historian, born in Overyssel in 1537. His histories are not reliable. Died in 1611.

Mid'dl-man, (SAMUEL,) an English engraver, born in 1746. He engraved landscapes with success. Died in 1818.

Mid'dle-ton, (ARTHUR,) an American statesman, born in South Carolina, succeeded Nicholson as governc of that colony in 1725.

Middleton, (ARTHUR,) an American patriot of the Revolution, born in South Carolina in 1743, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He took the degree of A.B. at Cambridge, England, and after his return was a delegate from his native State to the United States Congress in 1776. He was subsequently re-elected in 1782. Died in 1787.

Mid'dle-ton, (CONYERS,) a celebrated English scholar, divine, and controversialist, born in Yorkshire in 1683. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1706. He was created D.D. in 1717, on which occasion he opposed the claims of Bentley (then regius professor of divinity) to an exorbitant fee. A lawsuit followed, in which Bentley was defeated. Middleton published, soon after, "A Full and Impartial Account of the Proceedings in the University of Cambridge against Dr. Bentley," which, though highly vindictive in its tone, is esteemed a master-piece of English style. He was appointed chief librarian of the university about 1720. Having visited Italy in 1724, he published, after his return, his "Letter from Rome," (1729,) in which he maintains that "the religion of the present Romans is derived from their heathen ancestors." Having brought upon himself the charge of infidelity by this work and succeeding publications, he wrote a pamphlet in defence of his orthodoxy, which, however, failed to remove the unfavourable impression he had made. He brought out in 1741 his "History of the Life of M. T. Cicero," which, though marred with some grave defects, was received with extraordinary favour. In 1749 he published "A Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Christian Church," in which he insists that the Protestant clergy should deny the authority of the Fathers entirely, or admit the truth of the leading Catholic doctrines. Died in 1750.

Middleton, (EDWARD,) an English gentleman, born at Twickenham, settled in South Carolina, and was the founder of a family which produced several distinguished statesmen.

Middleton, (ERASMUS,) an English writer, published a "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," and a collection of lives of eminent Protestant theologians, entitled "Biographia Evangelica." Died in 1805.

Middleton, (HENRY,) son of Arthur Middleton, Governor of South Carolina, was president of Congress in 1775.

Middleton, (Sir HENRY,) an English navigator, born about 1570, entered the service of the East India Company. In 1610 he conducted an expedition to Mocha, Surat, and Bantam. Died in 1615.

Middleton, (HENRY,) an American statesman under the administration of President Monroe, was elected Governor of South Carolina, and in 1820 was minister to Russia. Died in 1846. His son HENRY, born in Paris in 1797, has published several political treatises.

Middleton, (Sir HUGH,) a wealthy citizen of London, born about 1565, is chiefly known from the important service he rendered to London by uniting two streams in Hertfordshire and Middlesex, for supplying the city with water. The stream formed by this junction, called the New River, was conveyed a distance of about thirty-eight miles. He was made a baronet in 1622. Died in 1631.

See LYSONS, "Environs of London."

Middleton, (JOHN IZARD,) son of Arthur, noticed above, (1743–87,) was born in 1785. He wrote a work entitled "The Cyclopean Walls." Died in 1849.

Middleton, (THOMAS,) an English dramatist, flourished during the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. Nothing is known of his life, except that he was chronologer to the city of London in 1620. Two of his principal plays are entitled "A Mad World, my Masters," and "The Roaring Girl." The latter is said to be a true picture of London life at that time. Middleton also assisted Rowley, Fletcher, and Jonson in the composition of several of their plays. One of his dramas, entitled "The Witch," is supposed to have furnished Shakspeare with the witch-scenes in "Macbeth." Died about 1626.

See CAMPBELL, "Specimens of the British Poets;" BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Middleton, (THOMAS FANSHAWE,) D.D., an English prelate, born in Derbyshire in 1769. He took his degree in 1808, and was appointed Archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1812. Soon after this the government having decided to constitute a bishopric in India, Dr. Middleton was consecrated first Bishop of Calcutta, in 1814. Having previously been made a Fellow of the Royal Society, he set sail for India. He laid the foundation of the Bishops' College at Calcutta, in 1820, and established a consistory court in that city. While zealously engaged in his duties, he was attacked with a fever, of which he died in 1822. His principal work is entitled "The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament."

Mid'gard's* Serpent, (or Miðgarðsormr, mith'-garthz-ormr',) called also the World-Serpent, and Jörmungand, in the Norse mythology, the great serpent which surrounds the world, the offspring of Loki and the female Jötun Angurboda, (Angrboða.) The gods, having learned that the children of Loki and Angurboda were destined at some future day to be fatal to them, determined to get possession of those children while they were still young. They were accordingly brought, and Midgard's Serpent was cast into the ocean, where it grew till it encircled the world, biting its own tail. At the end of the world (Ragnaröck) the world-serpent will fight among the enemies of the gods and be slain by Thor, who, however, will die in mediately afterwards from the effect of its venom. The myth of the world-serpent is supposed to signify the deep or main ocean, which, excited by Loki, (subterranean fire or earth-

Midhat Pasha, mid'hât pâ'shâ, a Turkish statesman, born in Constantinople in 1822. In 1845 he entered the civil service as a clerk, and he was afterwards employed in various positions of high trust. In 1857 he crushed out brigandage in Roumelia, and soon after he became acting governor of Bulgaria. In 1860 he was made a pasha, and was appointed governor of Southern Albania. In 1864 he was commissioned as governor-general of Bulgaria. He was then successively president of the council of state, grand vizier, governor of Bagdad, and minister of justice. He was concerned in the deposition of Abdool Azeez and of Moorâd V., and in 1876 again became grand vizier, but was soon banished. In 1878 he was appointed governor-general of Syria. In 1881 he was condemned to death on the charge of having murdered the Sultan Abdool Azeez, but was finally banished to Southern Arabia. Died May 11, 1884.

Mieczyslaw, me-êtch'is-lâv, [Lat. MICCISLA'US or MICISLA'US,] I., surnamed THE GLORIOUS, called also Miesko, (me-ês'ko,) Duke of Poland, was born at Posen in 931. Having become converted to Christianity, he showed great zeal in its promulgation and the extirpation of paganism. He died in 992. A monument, by Rauch, was erected to his memory at Posen.

See KADLUBECK, "Annales;" SEIDEL, "Von dem ersten christlichen Polnischen Fürsten Miecislas," 1752.

Mieczyslaw or Miesko II., King of Poland, born in 990, succeeded to the throne in 1025. He was deficient in talent and energy, and lost a considerable portion of his territory to the Germans and Hungarians. He died in 1034, and was succeeded by his son, Casimir I.

Miel, meel, or Meel, mâl, (JAN,) or GIOVANNI DELLO VITE, (jo-vân'nee dêl'lo vee'tà,) a celebrated Flemish painter, born near Antwerp in 1599. He was a pupil of Andrea Sacchi, but he afterwards adopted the style of Bamboccio. His favourite subjects were pastoral and hunting scenes, gypsies, beggars, and carnivals, in which he has never been surpassed. He was patronized by Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, who made him his painter and presented him with a diamond cross of great value. Many of the best works of this artist are in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Died in 1664.

Miguel, me-gĕl', (Dom or Don MARIA EVARISTO,) a Portuguese prince, born in Lisbon in 1802, was a younger son of John VI. He became the head of the absolutist party, and in 1828 usurped the throne, the lawful heir of which was his niece, Dona Maria. The partisans of this queen maintained her title by arms, and were aided by her father, Don Pedro, and Admiral Napier. Miguel was defeated in several actions, and was expelled from Spain in May, 1834. Died in 1866.

Mih-Teih, mĭh-tā', or Mé-Teih, an eminent Chinese philosopher, who lived about 400 B.C. Dr. Legge says of him that he was an original thinker, and exercised a bolder judgment on things than Confucius or any of his followers. He taught that all the evils in society arise from the want of mutual universal love. For example, a prince loves only his own state, and does not love the neighbouring state. Therefore he makes war against it. "If princes," he asked, "regarded other states as their own, who would begin a war? If every one regarded his neighbour's person as his own, who would be found to rob? If universal love prevailed, all enmities, usurpations, and miseries would disappear. Princes, loving one another, would have no battle-fields; the chiefs of families, loving one another, would attempt no usurpations; men, loving one another, would commit no robberies."

Mijatovich, (CHEDONILLE,) a Servian diplomatist, born at Belgrade in 1842. He became professor of political economy at the College of Belgrade in 1865. He afterwards held positions in the Servian cabinet, and was minister to Roumania in 1884 and to England in 1895. He wrote several novels and other works, and his wife (Elodie Lawton, an English woman) wrote on Servian history, folk-lore, etc.

He published, among other works, an "Account of the Campaign in France in 1814." Died in 1848.

Miklosich, mik'lo-zĭk', (FRANZ,) a German linguist, profoundly versed in the Slavonian language, born at Luttenberg, in Styria, in 1813. He wrote a "Lexicon of the Old Slavonian Language," (in Latin, 1850,) a "Comparative Grammar of the Slavonian Languages," (1852–56,) "On the Dialects and the Wanderings of the Gypsies of Europe," (1872–77,) etc., and the great etymological Slav dictionary, (1886.) Died in 1891.

Milan (mee'lân) I., King of Servia, was born at Jassy, August 10, 1854. He was a grand-nephew of Milos Obrenovitch, and was adopted as his heir by his second cousin, Michael III., (Obrenovitch,) Prince of Servia. When Michael was murdered in 1868, Prince Milan was at school in Paris, but he at once returned to Servia, and was in 1872 crowned at Belgrade as Prince Milan IV. In 1876 he declared war against Turkey, and was defeated, but joined Russia in the war of 1877 and obtained independence for Servia. He was crowned king in 1876, but was not recognized by the powers as such till 1882. He married Natalie, a Russian lady, but obtained an illegal divorce from her in 1888, the quarrel leading to his abdication, in favour of his son Alexander, in 1889. He was subsequently reconciled to his wife and returned to reside in Belgrade.

Milanollo, me-lă-nol'lo, (TERESA,) an Italian violinist, born at Sevigliano, near Turin, in 1827. Before she was seven years old she made her first public appearance in Turin, and she was subsequently taken to Paris by her father, where she met with great success. Her younger sister, MARIA, born in 1832, now began to show almost equal talent, and the sisters henceforth appeared together, making tours through France, Germany, England, and Italy. Maria died in 1848, and Teresa soon afterwards married M. Parmentier and retired to private life.

Milbourne, mil'bŭrn, (LUKE,) an English writer and divine, born in 1667, published a "Poetical Translation of the Psalms," (1698,) "Notes on Dryden's Virgil," and other works. He is one of the authors satirized in Pope's "Dunciad." Died in 1720.

He returned to France in 1796, and was created by Bonaparte a general of brigade. He published a narrative of his residence among the Creeks, entitled "Séjour dans la Nation Creek." Died about 1814.

Milizia, me-lēt'se-ä, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian architect and writer, born in Otranto in 1725, was an intimate friend of Raphael Mengs. He was the author of "Lives of the Most Celebrated Architects of all Nations," (1768,) a revised edition of which was entitled "Memorie degli Architetti antichi e moderni," ("Memoirs of Ancient and Modern Architects," 2 vols., 1781,) which were translated into French and English, a treatise "On the Theatre," (1772,) "Principles of Civil Architecture," ("Elementi di Architettura civile," 3 vols., 1781,) which was highly esteemed and was translated into various languages, a "Dictionary of Fine Arts," (1797,) and other works. He lived many years in Rome, where he died in 1798.

Mill, (HENRY,) an English engineer, born at London about 1680. He supplied the town of Northampton with water, and was appointed principal engineer to the New River Company.

Mill, (HUGH ROBERT,) an English geographer, born at Thurso in 1861. He became secretary of the Royal Geographical Society in 1892, and published various books on geography, also the "Realm of Nature," (1892,) "The English Lakes," (1895,) etc.

Mill, (JAMES,) a British historian and writer on political economy, born at Montrose, in Scotland, in 1773. He studied at Edinburgh, and distinguished himself by his attainments in the Greek language, metaphysics, and moral philosophy. Having removed to London in 1800, he became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review" and other periodicals. He published (1817–19) his 'History of British India," (in 5 vols. 8vo,) a work of great merit, which procured for him the office of head of the department of Indian correspondence in the India House. "We know of no work," says Mr. Grote, "which surpasses his 'History of British India' in the main excellences attainable by historical writers,—industrious accumulation, continued for many years, of original authorities, careful and conscientious criticism of their statements, and a large command of psychological analysis, enabling the author to interpret phenomena of society both extremely complicated and far removed from his own personal experience." (See "Review of J. S. Mill's Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," London, 1868.) Among his other productions are a series of essays on "Jurisprudence," "Liberty of the Press," "Law of Nations," etc. These, first published in the "Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica," were very favourably received, and were followed by his "Elements of Political Economy," which appeared in 1821, and his "Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind," in 1829. Mill was an intimate friend of Jeremy Bentham, and one of the ablest expounders of his system. Died in 1836.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement;) "Edinburgh Review" for March, 1829; "Monthly Review" for August and October, 1821.

Mill, [Lat. MIL'LIUS,] (JOHN,) an English theologian and pulpit orator, born in Westmoreland about 1645. He became chaplain-in-ordinary to Charles II. in 1681, and in 1704 was made a canon of Canterbury. He published a critical edition of the New Testament in Greek, (1707,) which is highly esteemed. Died in 1707.

See CHALMERS, "General Biographical Dictionary."

Mill, (JOHN STUART,) an eminent English philosopher and economist, son of James Mill, author of the "History of British India," was born in London in May, 1806. He was educated at home by his father, and entered in 1823 the service of the East India Company as a clerk in the India House. In his early life he contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Westminster Review." He published in 1843 a "System of Logic, Rationative and Inductive," (2 vols.,) and, in 1844, "Essays on some Unsettled Questions in Political Economy." He acquired a high reputation by a popular work entitled "The Principles of Political Economy, with some of their Applications to Social Philosophy," (1848.) As a writer he was distinguished by originality of thought and acuteness in reasoning. In political principles he was an advanced Liberal, and all his sympathies were in favour of liberty and progress. About 1850 he married Harriet Taylor, a lady of rare intellectual powers. He became examiner of Indian correspondence in 1856. During the rebellion in the United States, Mr. Mill was among the few prominent English writers who defended the cause of the North and of the Federal Union. Among his later works were an "Essay on Liberty" and "An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," (1865,) of which a highly favourable review from the pen of Mr. Grote, the historian, has been published, (London, 1868.) He was for some time editor of the "Westminster Review." In 1865 he was elected a member of Parliament for Westminster. He became an able debater, and made several speeches in favour of reform and extension of the elective franchise in 1866 and 1867. His career as a legislator was very successful. "Mr. Mill's success," says the "New York Commercial Advertiser," August 29, 1867, "has been the most marked and decided in the annals of Parliament. No man has ever before acquired so high a consideration in so short a time." He was, however, defeated in the general election of 1868. Mr. Mill distinguished himself as an earnest and able advocate of the rights of women. In his work entitled "The Subjection of Women," (1869,) he takes the ground "that the principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement, and that it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality." Died May 8, 1873.

Millais, mil'lā', (JOHN EVERETT,) an English painter, of French extraction, born at Southampton in 1829, was one of the founders of what is called the "Pre-Raphaelite School." He studied at the Royal Academy, and at an early age produced several works of superior merit, among which was "The Benjamites seizing the Daughters of Shiloh." His "Return of the Dove to the Ark," "Child of the Regiment," "Ophelia," "The Order of Release," and "Joan of Arc" are among his most admired productions. He was made a baronet in 1885 and became president of the Royal Academy in February, 1896. Died August 13, 1896.

His son, JOHN GUILLE MILLAIS, born at London in 1865, became a traveller and hunter, illustrated natural history works, and wrote "Game Birds and Shooting Sketches," (1892,) "British Deer and their Horns," (1897,) etc.

Mil'lar, (JOHN,) an eminent Scottish jurist, born in Lanarkshire in 1735. He studied at Glasgow, where he became in 1761 professor of civil law. The spirited and attractive style of his lectures, which, says a critic in the "Edinburgh Review," "gave to a learned discussion the charms of an animated and interesting conversation," drew great numbers to the university, and made it for the time one of the most flourishing and popular in the kingdom. He was the author of "Origin of the Distinction of Ranks," (1771,) and a "Historical View of the English Government from the Settlement of the Saxons to the Accession of the House of Stuart," (1787.) The former was translated into French, German, and Italian. Died in 1801.

Mil'lard, (DAVID,) an American divine, born at Ballston, New York, in 1794, published several theological works, also "Travels in Egypt, Arabia, and the Holy Land," (1843.) Died at Jackson, Michigan, August 3, 1873.

Millard, (HARRISON,) an American composer, born at Boston in 1829. Among his musical pieces are the songs "Waiting" and "Under the Daisies," and the opera "Leah." His daughter Maria appeared as a prima donna in 1894. He died in 1895.

Mil'ledge, (JOHN,) an American patriot and statesman, born at Savannah, Georgia, in 1757, distinguished himself in the war of the Revolution, and in 1802 was elected Governor of Georgia. He was one of the founders of the University of Georgia, and the former capital of the State was named in his honour. Died in 1818.

Mil'ler, (CHARLES HENRY,) an American artist, born in New York city, March 20, 1842. He studied art at the National Academy, New York, and at Munich. He first exhibited at the National Academy in 1860. He afterwards studied medicine, and graduated as M.D. in 1863 at the New York Homœopathic College, but he never practised that profession. In 1873 he became an associate, and in 1875 a full member, of the National Academy.

Mil'ler, (EDWARD,) an American physician, born in Delaware in 1760, was a brother of the Rev. Samuel Miller, noticed below. He became professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and wrote, among other works, a "Treatise on Yellow Fever," which is highly esteemed. He was one of the founders of the "Medical Repository," the first medical journal of America. Died in 1812.

Mil'ler, (EDWARD,) an English musician and writer, born at Norwich, was a pupil of Dr. Burney. He was the author of "Institutes of Music" and "Elements of Thorough Bass and Composition." Died in 1807.

Miller, (HARRIET MANN,) author and lecturer under the nom-de-plume of Olive Thorne, was born at Auburn, New York, in 1831, and married W. T. Miller in 1854. Her writings comprise several works on bird-life, also "Four-Handed Folk," "Little Folks in Feathers and Furs," etc.

Mil'ler, (HUGH,) an eminent Scottish geologist and writer, born at Cromarty on the 10th of October 1802, was a son of a mariner and shipmaster, who perished in a storm in 1807. He attended the grammar-school of the parish, and received instruction from two maternal uncles, James and Alexander Wright, one of whom encouraged his taste for natural history. At an early age he began to write verses. He learned the trade of a stone-mason, and commenced in 1819 his life of labour in a quarry of old red sandstone at Cromarty. "It was the necessity which made me a quarrier," he writes, "that taught me to be a geologist." He worked as a mason in various parts of Scotland, and diligently improved the intervals of labour by the cultivation of his mind. In 1825 and 1826 he was employed at Edinburgh as a stone-cutter. He afterwards published a volume of poems, and in 1834 relinquished his trade to become an accountant in a bank at Cromarty. In 1835 he produced "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland," which was received with favour. He married about 1836.

In 1839 he defended with much ability the cause of the Free Church, in a "Letter from One of the Scotch People to Lord Brougham," which was praised by Mr. Gladstone. He became in 1840 editor of the "Witness," an organ of the Free Church or Non-Intrusionists, published in Edinburgh twice a week. He continued to edit this paper until his death, and rendered it very popular and influential. His reputation as a geologist was increased by his work entitled "The Old Red Sandstone, or New Walks in an Old Field," (1841,) which is written in an attractive style. He afterwards published "Footprints of the Creator," (1849,) "First Impressions of England and its People," (1851,) an interesting autobiography entitled "My Schools and Schoolmasters, or the Story of my Education," (1854,) and "The Cruise of the Betsey." These works mark an important epoch in the progress of geology. "There was nothing in Miller's works," says the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1858, "which so much surprised the public as their mere literary merit. Where could this Cromarty mason have acquired his style?"

In consequence of excessive mental exertion, his brain became diseased. During a paroxysm of insanity, he killed himself with a pistol in December, 1856. He had just finished a work entitled "The Testimony of the Rocks, or Geology in its Bearings on the Two Theologies, Natural and Revealed," (1857.) In this work he rejects the theory that the Mosaic account of the creation is purely parable, while he censures those who refuse to accept the evidences of scientific truths when they seem to clash with traditionary interpretations of Scripture. His "Footprints of the Creator" was written to refute the theory of development advocated by the author of "The Vestiges of Creation." "Hugh Miller," says the "Edinburgh Review," "must undoubtedly be regarded as one of the most remarkable men whom Scotland has produced. . . . The interest of his narrative, the purity of his style, his inexhaustible faculty of happy and ingenious illustration, his high imaginative power, and that light of genius which it is so difficult to define yet so impossible to mistake, all promise to secure for the author of the 'Old Red Sandstone' the lasting admiration of his countrymen."

Miller, (JAMES,) an English dramatist and satirical writer, born in Dorsetshire in 1703. He published several political pamphlets, a satire entitled "The Humours of Oxford," and a number of comedies. Died in 1744.

Miller, (JAMES,) an American officer, born at Peterborough, New Hampshire, about 1776. He served as colonel with distinction at the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, July 25, 1814. His commander asked him if he could take a certain battery at Lundy's Lane. He answered, "I'll try, sir," and captured the battery. Died in 1851.

Miller, (JOAQUIN,) the literary name of CINCINNATUS HEINE MILLER, an American poet, born at Cincinnati, Ohio, November 10, 1842. He went with his father's family westward when very young, and in 1852 reached Lane county, Oregon. In 1856 he began a roving life, and served for a time with Walker in Honduras. In 1860 he began to practise law in Oregon. In 1863 a newspaper which he edited was suppressed for disloyalty. He was county judge for Grant county, Oregon, 1866–70. Among his poems are "Songs of the Sierras," "Songs of the Sunlands," "The Ship in the Desert," "The First Fam'lies of the Sierras," etc. Later works of his (chiefly prose) are "The Danites," (an effective and successful play,) "My Life among the Modocs," "The Shadows of Shasta," "The Baroness of New York," "In Classic Shade," (1890,) "My Own Story," (1891,) etc.

Miller, mil'ler, (JOHANN MARTIN,) a German poet and fictitious writer, born at Ulm in 1750. He was the author of "Correspondence of Three Academic Friends," "Siegwart, a Convent History," (1776,) which was translated into French, Dutch, and Polish, and several other popular works. His lyric poems are highly esteemed. He was an intimate friend of Klopstock and Voss. Died in 1814.

Miller, (JOSEPH,) a celebrated English comedian, whose appreciation as an actor of the wit of Congreve's plays contributed in a great measure to their success, was born in 1684. The jests ascribed to him were in reality compiled by John Motley, author of a "Life of Peter the Great." Died in 1738.

Miller, (PHILIP,) an English botanist and florist, born in 1691. He published a "Catalogue of Hardy Trees, Shrubs, etc. cultivated near London," (with coloured plates, 1730,) "Gardener's Dictionary," (1731,) which was translated into several languages, and "Figures of Plants," (2 vols., 1755,) adapted to the Dictionary. The genus Milleria was named by Dr. Martyn in honour of this botanist. Died in 1771.

Miller, (SAMUEL,) D.D., an American Presbyterian divine, born in Delaware in 1769. He became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in New York in 1793. In 1813 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in the Theological Seminary of Princeton. He was the author of numerous theological and controversial works, and wrote the "Life of Jonathan Edwards," in Sparks's "American Biography." Died in 1850.

See SAMUEL MILLER, "Life of Samuel Miller," 2 vols., 1869.

Miller, (SAMUEL FREEMAN,) LL.D., an American jurist, born at Richmond, Kentucky, April 5, 1816. He graduated as M.D. at Transylvania University in 1838. He afterwards became a lawyer, and in 1850 removed to Iowa. In 1862 he was appointed a justice of the United States Supreme Court. Died Oct. 13, 1890.

Miller, (STEPHEN FRANKS,) an American lawyer and journalist, born in North Carolina, became associate editor of "De Bow's Review" about 1848. He published the "Bench and Bar of Georgia," etc. Died in 1867.

Miller, (THOMAS,) an English poet and basket-maker, born at Gainsborough about 1808. He was patronized by the poet Rogers, by whose aid he became a bookseller. He wrote, besides numerous poems, the novels "Royston Gower" and "Fair Rosamond." Died in 1874.

Miller, (WALTER,) an American classicist, was born in Ashland county, Ohio, in 1864. He studied at Michigan University, Leipsic, and Athens, and was made professor of classical philology at Stanford University in 1892. He published works on excavations in Greece, classical history, and philology, "The Old and New," (1898,) "Stella's Great Sea-Beasts," (1899,) etc.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) founder of the sect of the Millerites, was born at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in 1781. About 1833 he began to prophesy the end of the world, which he affirmed would be destroyed in 1843. He died in 1849; and his followers, who are said to have numbered nearly fifty thousand, have since greatly decreased.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) an eminent line-engraver, born at Edinburgh, Scotland, May 28, 1796. He was a Quaker, and spent most of his life in his native town. His engravings after Turner are especially admirable. Died at Sheffield, England, January 20, 1882.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) "the Laureate of the Nursery," a Scottish poet, born in Glasgow in August, 1810. He was a wood-turner by trade, and his only published volume was "Scottish Nursery Songs, and other Poems," (1863.) Of his songs "Wee Willie Winkie" is perhaps the best-known. Died in Glasgow, August 20, 1872.

Miller, (WILLIAM ALLEN,) an English chemist and physician, born at Ipswich in 1817. He took his medical degree in London, and subsequently studied in the laboratory of Liebig at Giessen. He was appointed professor of chemistry in the Royal College in 1845, and assayer at the Mint and Bank of England in 1851. He was vice-president of the Royal Society and president of the Chemical Society, and wrote "Elements of Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical," (1850.) Died Sept. 30, 1870.

Miller, (WILLIAM HALLOWS,) F.R.S., an eminent English mineralogist and physicist, was born near Llandovery, Wales, April 6, 1801. He was educated at Saint John's College, Cambridge. He became professor of mineralogy at Cambridge in 1832, and wrote several treatises on crystallography. His most important work is a new and greatly-improved edition of Phillips's "Elementary Introduction to Mineralogy," (1852.) He was a member of a commission appointed by government in 1843 for the restoration of the standards of weight and measure, and he constructed and verified the new national standard of weight. Died May 20, 1880.

Milles, milz, (JEREMIAH,) an English divine and antiquary, born in 1714, became Dean of Exeter in 1762. He was a contributor to the "Archæologia," and made an unsuccessful attempt to vindicate the authenticity of Rowley's poems. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and president of the Society of Antiquaries. Died in 1784.

Milner, (JOSEPH,) an English divine, born near Leeds in 1744, was a brother of Isaac, noticed above. He became vicar of the Church of the Holy Trinity at Hull in 1797. He wrote a "History of the Church of Christ," (5 vols., 1794-1812,) which is esteemed a standard work. It was completed by his brother, the Dean of Carlisle. Milner also published an "Answer to Gibbon's Attack on Christianity," and other works. Died in 1797.

Milnes, milnz, (RICHARD MONCKTON,) Baron Houghton, an English statesman and miscellaneous writer, born in Yorkshire in 1809. He graduated at Cambridge in 1831, and in 1837 was first elected a member of Parliament for Pontefract, which he continued to represent until 1863, when he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Houghton. As a member of the liberal conservative party, he was a prominent advocate of reform. Among his principal publications are "Poems, Legendary and Historical," "Palm-Leaves," (1844,) "Memorials of Many Scenes," and the "Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of John Keats," (1848.) He contributed to the "Edinburgh Review." Died August 11, 1885.

Mī'lo, [Gr. Μίλων; Fr. MILON, me'lôn',] an athlete, celebrated for his prodigious strength, born at Crotona, in Italy, was a pupil of Pythagoras. He is said to have once carried a bull on his shoulders to the sacrifice, and killed it with a blow of his fist. In 509 B.C. he gained a signal victory over the Sybarites. When advanced in years, he found one day, in passing through a forest, a tree partly cleft by wedges. Having introduced his hands for the purpose of severing it entirely, the wedges fell out, but, his strength failing him, the parts closed again, retaining him a prisoner, and in this helpless condition he was devoured by wild beasts.

Mī'lo, (TITUS ANNIUS,) a famous Roman tribune, was a plebeian, and a man of unscrupulous character. He became tribune of the people in 57 B.C., and was a partisan of Pompey. By his efforts to restore Cicero from exile he incurred the hostility of Clodius, with whom he fought in several bloody affrays. In the year 53 Milo was a candidate for the consulship. Before the electoral contest was decided, Milo and Clodius met, each with a band of armed slaves, and a fight ensued, in which Clodius was killed. Milo was tried for homicide, and, though defended by Cicero, was condemned, and exiled himself to Marseilles. Having taken arms against Cæsar in the civil war, he was killed in Lucania, 48 B.C.

Miloradovitch, me-lo-rä'do-vitch, (MICHAEL ANDRIEVITCH,) COUNT, a Russian general, born at Saint Petersburg in 1770. He fought with distinction against the Turks and Poles and in the campaigns against the French from 1799 to 1814, and attained the rank of general of infantry. He was appointed military governor of Saint Petersburg in 1819. He was killed in attempting to suppress the insurrection in that city, December 25, 1825.

Mil-tī'ą-dēs, [Gr. Μιλτιάδης; Fr. MILTIADE, mêl'-te'ăd',] a celebrated Athenian general, who flourished about 500 B.C., was the son of Cimon. He became successor to his uncle Miltiades, who had made himself a despot or master of the Chersonese in Thrace, and he appears first in history as an arbitrary ruler. Darius of Persia having sent a great armament, under Datis and Artaphernes, to conquer Greece, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals of the Athenian army, which awaited the enemy at Marathon in 490 B.C. The Grecian army numbered about 10,000 men, and the Persian probably over 100,000. A regulation then prevailed that each of the ten generals should command by turns for one day. Some of them were averse to risking a battle. When the command devolved on Miltiades, he gained one of the most memorable and important victories recorded in history. To reward his patriotism and eminent services to national liberty, the Athenians decreed that he should have the foremost place in a painting which illustrated the battle. Having failed in an attack on Paros, he was fined fifty talents, which he could not pay, and about the year 489 died in prison of a wound received in the action just named. The famous general Cimon was his son.

Miltitz, von, fon mil'tits, (KARL,) a German prelate, born about 1490, became chamberlain to Leo X., who sent him in 1518 as nuncio to Germany, in order to conciliate Luther or counteract his influence. On this occasion he displayed much tact, and used flattery or persuasive means with some success. (See LUTHER.) Died in 1529.

Miltitz, von, (KARL BORROMÄUS ALEXANDER STEPHAN,) a German poet and musical composer, born at Dresden in 1781. Among his best compositions are the operas of "Saul" and "Georg Czerny." Died in 1845. His brother ALEXANDER was ambassador to Constantinople, and wrote a valuable work entitled "The Manual of Consuls." Died in 1843.

Mil'ton, [Lat. MILTO'NUS; It. MIL'TON or MILTONO, mêl-to'no,] (JOHN,) an immortal poet, and, if we except Shakspeare, the most illustrious name in English literature, was born in Bread Street, London, on the 9th of December, 1608. He was the eldest son of John Milton, a scrivener, and Sarah Bradshaw, (or Caston, according to some authorities.) His early education was directed by a private tutor,—Thomas Young, a zealous Puritan. A portrait of his beautiful features, taken by C. Jansen, at the age of ten, has been preserved. Before he entered college he was an excellent Latin scholar. In severe and systematic study he laid the foundations of his fame. In a letter to a friend, written some years later, he says, "It is my way to suffer no impediment, no love of ease, no avocation whatever, to chill the ardour, to break the continuity, or to divert the completion of my literary pursuits." His first English poems were versions of the 114th and 136th Psalms, (1623.)

In February, 1624, he was admitted as pensioner into Christ's College, Cambridge, where he acquired distinction as a Latin poet. Dr. Johnson expresses the opinion that Milton "was the first Englishman who, after the revival of letters, wrote Latin verses with classic elegance." He took the degree of Bachelor in 1628, and that of Master of Arts in 1632,—before which he had been subjected to a temporary rustication (and, some say, to corporal chastisement) for an unknown offence. "By the intention of my parents," says Milton himself, "I was destined of a child to the service of the Church, and in my own resolutions. Till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the Church, that he who would take orders must subscribe SLAVE, and take an oath withal, . . . I thought better to prefer a blameless silence, before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing."

In 1632 he left the university, and retired to his father's house at Horton, Buckinghamshire, where he remained five years, during which he is said to have read all the Greek and Latin writers. He also took lessons in music, which he loved, and in which he was very skilful. In this studious retirement, it appears, he wrote his beautiful poems "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas," (1637.) "Comus"—a drama in form, but essentially lyrical—was written and performed at Ludlow Castle in 1634, but not printed until 1637. "It is certainly," says Macaulay, "the noblest performance of the kind which exists in any language." "Lycidas" is contemptuously depreciated by Johnson as a "pastoral, easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting."

But Hallam approves the judgment of a certain critic (whom he does not name) that "Lycidas" is "a good test of a real feeling for what is peculiarly called poetry." Milton's "Allegro" and "Penseroso" are universally admired. "It is impossible to conceive," says Macaulay, "that the mechanism of language can be brought to a more exquisite degree of perfection. These poems differ from others as ottar of roses differs from ordinary rose-water."

In 1638, attended by a servant, he visited Florence, Rome, and Naples, conversed with Galileo, then a "prisoner to the Inquisition," and received testimonials of honour and friendship from Carlo Dati, Francini, and Manso. He was admired as a great prodigy by these Italian celebrities. He returned in 1639, and opened in London a small boarding-school, in which he adopted a new system of education. His nephews, Edward and John Philips, were among his pupils. In 1641 he produced his first prose work,—a "Treatise of Reformation,"—which was followed by other arguments against the Established Church and Prelacy. He sympathized with the popular party in the great crisis of English liberty, but took no active part in the civil war which began in 1642.

At Whitsuntide, 1643, he married Mary Powell, whose father was a justice of the peace and a royalist of Oxfordshire. "The lady," says Dr. Johnson, "seems not much to have delighted in the pleasures of spare diet and hard study." A month after the marriage, she made a visit to her father's house, from which she refused to return. Having resolved to repudiate her, Milton published "The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce," (1644,) and other treatises on that topic, in his own justification. He also paid his addresses to a Miss Davis, until his wife implored forgiveness and was restored to favour. She became the mother of three daughters, who were all the children that Milton had.

He published in 1644 his "Areopagitica," or "Plea for Unlicensed Printing,"—probably his greatest prose work. "Many passages in this famous tract," says Hallam, "are admirably eloquent: an intense love of liberty and truth glows through it." He had taken a larger house in Barbican (about 1645) for the reception of scholars; but his wife's relations, to whom, when ruined by the civil war, he generously gave refuge, occupied his rooms. In March, 1648–49, he was appointed Latin secretary to the council of state, which was the highest executive power in the new republic. As an antidote to the "Eikon Basilike," i.e. the "Image (or Portrait) of the King,"—a work designed to excite commiseration for the sufferings of Charles I., (see GAUDEN,)—Milton produced his "Iconoclastes," (Eikonoklastes,) or "Image-breaker," and, by order of the council, appeared as the antagonist of the learned Salmasius, in reply to whom he wrote, in Latin, his celebrated work entitled "Defence of the English People," ("Defensio Populi Anglicani," 1650.) (See SALMASIUS.)

About 1654 he became totally blind. His "Defensio Secunda" (1654) contains an eloquent allusion to this privation. His wife died about 1653, and in 1656 he married Catherine Woodcock, who died in the following year. After serving the Protector Oliver as Latin secretary for four or five years, he retired about 1657 from public life, with a pension of £150. Before that date he had meditated the plan of a great epic poem. One of the subjects that presented was the exploits of King Arthur. After much deliberation, "long choosing and beginning late," he preferred the subject of "Paradise Lost," which at first he proposed to dramatize. At the restoration, (1660,) his prosecution was ordered, and he concealed himself in the house of a friend until the Act of Oblivion released him from danger. He married his third wife, Elizabeth Minshul, in 1664; and when the great plague raged in London, (1665,) he retired to Chalfont, Bucks, where his friend Ellwood had engaged a cottage for him. (See ELLWOOD, THOMAS.) In the course of the same year Milton showed to Ellwood the finished manuscript of "Paradise Lost," which the latter took home and perused. On returning it to the author, he remarked, 'Thou hast said much here of Paradise Lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" Milton sold his copy in April, 1667, to Samuel Simmons, for an immediate payment of five pounds and the promise of an equal sum after the sale of thirteen hundred copies. It was rather coldly received, only three thousand having been sold in the first eleven years. "Its admirers," says Johnson, "did not dare to publish their opinion."

He published in 1671 "Samson Agonistes," a tragedy, and "Paradise Regained," which he is said to have esteemed his most perfect production; but the public and the critics have not sanctioned this preference. Milton died in London, by "a silent expiration," on the 8th of November, 1674.

A manuscript of Milton's "On Christian Doctrine," ("De Doctrina Christiana,") found in the State-Paper Office, London, in 1823, was translated and published in 1825. The genuineness of this work, though sometimes called in question, is considered by the great majority of critics to be established beyond reasonable doubt.

Milton was not connected with any church, but appears to have favoured the Independents,—a politico-religious party. "He grew old without any visible worship," says Johnson; who adds, "His studies and meditations were an habitual prayer." His favourite authors among the Greeks were Homer and Euripides, and Shakspeare and Spenser among the English. His stature was rather below the middle height. In his youth he was so eminently and delicately beautiful as to be called "the Lady" of his college, though his habits were far from effeminate. He had a fair complexion and auburn hair. Portraits of him were taken at the ages of ten, twenty-one, and about sixty.

"Considered with respect to design," says Johnson, "'Paradise Lost' may claim the first place, and, with respect to performance, the second, among the productions of the human mind. . . . His [Milton's] great works were performed under discountenance and in blindness; but difficulties vanished at his touch: he was born for whatever is arduous; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems, only because it is not the first." "Was there ever anything so delightful," says Cowper, "as the music of 'Paradise Lost'? It is like that of a fine organ,—has the fullest and the deepest tones of majesty, with all the softness and elegance of the Dorian flute; variety without end, and never equalled, unless, perhaps, by Virgil." Of Milton's prose writings, Macaulay observes, "They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery."

"It is certain," says Hume, "that this author, when in a happy mood and employed on a noble subject, is the most wonderfully sublime of any poet in any language, Homer and Lucretius and Tasso not excepted. More concise than Homer, more simple than Tasso, more nervous than Lucretius, had he lived in a later age and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses, had he enjoyed better fortune and possessed leisure to watch the returns of genius in himself, he had attained the pinnacle of perfection and borne away the palm of epic poetry."

"It may be doubted," says Walter S. Landor, "whether the Creator ever created one altogether so great as Milton,—taking into one view at once his manly virtues, his superhuman genius, his zeal for truth, for true piety, true freedom, his eloquence in displaying it, his contempt of personal power, his glory and exultation in his country's."

"Milton," says Macaulay, "did not strictly belong to any of the classes which we have described. He was not a Puritan. He was not a Freethinker. He was not a Cavalier. In his character the noblest qualities of every party were combined in harmonious union. . . . We are not much in the habit of idolizing either the living or the dead. But there are a few characters which have stood the closest scrutiny and the severest tests, which have been tried in the furnace and have proved pure, which have been declared sterling by the general consent of mankind, and which are visibly stamped with the image and superscription of the Most High. These great men we trust we know how to prize; and of these was Milton. . . . His thoughts are powerful not only to delight, but to elevate and purify. Nor do we envy the man who can study either the life or the writings of the great poet and patriot without aspiring to emulate, not indeed the sublime works with which his genius has enriched our literature, but the zeal with which he laboured for the public good, the fortitude with which he endured every private calamity, the lofty disdain with which he looked down on temptation and dangers, the deadly hatred which he bore to bigots and tyrants, and the faith which he so sternly kept with his country and with his fame." ("Essay on Milton.")

Those who desire to know how this great poet is regarded by a nation whose taste and habits of thought differ most widely from those of the English, may consult the article "Milton" in the "Biographie Universelle," from the pen of the justly-celebrated French critic Villemain. He admits that Milton's picture of our first parents in Eden surpasses, in graceful and touching simplicity, anything to be found in the creations of any other poet, ancient or modern, and that the human imagination has produced nothing more grand or more sublime than some portions of "Paradise Lost."

Mil'ton, (JOHN,) an English musician and composer, the father of the poet. He was of an ancient Catholic family, and was disinherited for embracing Protestantism. Some of his tunes are contained in Ravenscroft's "Whole Book of Psalms," "The Triumphs of Oriana," and other contemporary publications. Died at an advanced age in March, 1647.

Milton, LORD. See FLETCHER, (ANDREW.)

Milutinovics or Milutinowitsch, pronounced alike me-loo-tee'no-vitch, (SIMON,) a Servian poet, born in 1791. He was the author of "Popular Songs of the Montenegrins," etc., "History of Servia from 1813 to 1815," and other works. Died at Belgrade, Jan. 11, 1848.

Mī'mas, [Gr. Μίμας,] a giant said to have been destroyed by Jupiter. The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was believed to rest upon his body.

Mim-ner'mus, [Gr. Μίμνερμος; Fr. MIMNERME, mĕm'nȧrm',] a Greek elegiac and lyric poet, born at Colophon about 630 B.C., was contemporary with Solon. The fragments of his poems have been published in the collections of Estienne, Brunck, and Boissonade; and, in a separate edition by Bach, Mimnermus is said to have invented the pentameter verse.

Mina, mee'nȧ, (Don FRANCISCO Espoz y—ês-pôth'e,) a celebrated Spanish general, sometimes called EL REY DE NAVARRA, ("the King of Navarre,") born near Pampeluna in 1782. As a guerilla chieftain, he successfully defended Navarre against the French in 1808 and the succeeding campaigns. Having been created marechal del campo in 1813, he endeavoured to excite an insurrection against the government of Ferdinand VII., but, failing in the attempt, took refuge in France. After his return to Spain, in 1820, he became captain-general of the armies of Navarre, Galicia, and Catalonia. He held several high offices under Queen Christina, for whom he fought against Don Carlos. Died in 1836.

Mina, (XAVIER,) a Spanish officer, born in Navarre in 1789, was a nephew of the preceding. He undertook to liberate Mexico, which he entered in April, 1817, with a few hundred men. He gained several victories, but was captured and shot at Mexico in November, 1817.

Miñano y Bedoya, de, dȧ mĕn-yȧ'no e bȧ-DO'e-ȧ, (SEBASTIAN,) a Spanish writer, born in the province of Palencia in 1779. He wrote "Letters from a Resident of Madrid," and a "History of the Spanish Revolution from 1820 to 1823," (in French.)

Mind, mĭnt, (GOTTFRIED,) a celebrated Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1768, was surnamed THE RAPHAEL OF CATS. He was the child of indigent parents, and a crétin, and was educated at Pestalozzi's institution for poor boys. His favourite subjects were cats and bears which he delineated with unequalled skill and fidelity. He died in 1814, leaving numerous designs, which were sold at a high price.

Minderer, mĭn'dẹh-rẹr, (RAIMOND,) a German physician, born at Augsburg about 1570, was the discoverer of a new chemical compound, (acetate of ammonia,) since called Spiritus Mindereri. He published several medical works in Latin, and became physician to the emperor Matthias. Died in 1621.

Minderhout, mĭn'dẹr-hŏwt', a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1577, excelled in marine views, seaports, etc. Died in 1663.

Minelli, me-nel'lee, [Lat. MINEL'LIUS,] (JAN,) a Dutch scholar, born at Rotterdam about 1625. He translated Terence into Dutch, and published numerous editions of the Latin classics, with notes, which had a high reputation at the time. Died in 1683.

Minellius. See MINELLI.

Mi'nẹr, (ALONZO AMES,) D.D., LL.D., an American clergyman, born at Lempster, New Hampshire, August 17, 1814, became pastor of a Universalist church in Massachusetts in 1839, and in 1842 accepted a pastorate in Boston. He was president of Tufts College, 1862–75, and was conspicuous in educational, temperance, and other reforms. Among his works are "Bible Exercises" and "Old Forts Taken," (1878.) Died June 14, 1895.

Mī'nẹr, (THOMAS,) an American physician, born at Middletown, Connecticut, in 1777. He wrote, conjointly with Dr. Tully, "Essays on Fevers and other Subjects," (1823.) Died in 1841.

Mī-ner'vȧ or A-the'nȧ, [Fr. MINERVE, me'nȧrv',] one of the greater divinities of the Roman mythology, corresponding nearly to the Greek Athena or Athene, [Gr. Ἀθήνη or Ἀθηνᾶ.] She was regarded as the goddess of wisdom, arts, and sciences, or a personification of the thinking, inventive faculty. According to a popular tradition, she was the offspring of the brain of Jupiter, from which she issued in full armour. She was always represented as a virgin. In war she was contradistinguished from Mars (the god of brute force) as the patroness of scientific warfare, and hence, according to the ancient poets, was always superior to him. The favourite plant of Minerva was the olive, and the animals consecrated to her were the owl and the serpent. Athena was the great national divinity of Attica and Athens, to which she is said to have given her name. Pope, in his "Temple of Fame," alludes to her twofold character as the patroness of arts and arms, where he says,

"There Cæsar, graced with both Minervas, shone."

In the Trojan war she fought for the Greeks. She was sometimes called Pallas, Parthenos, (i.e. "virgin,") Tritonia or Tritogeneia, and other names. The poets feigned that Neptune and Minerva disputed for the possession of Attica, which the gods promised to him or her who should produce the most useful gift to mankind. Neptune, striking the earth with his trident, produced a war-horse, and Minerva produced the olive, (the symbol of peace,) by which she gained the victory. She was usually represented with a helmet on her head, holding in one hand a spear and in the other an ægis, or shield, in the centre of which was the head of Medusa. There was a celebrated statue of Minerva, called Palladium, which was said to have fallen from the sky, and on which the safety of Troy depended.

Minga, del, dĕl mĕn'gȧ, (ANDREA,) an Italian painter, of the Florentine school, lived about 1550–70.

Mingarelli, mĕn-gȧ-rel'lee, (GIOVANNI LUIGI,) an Italian ecclesiastic and writer, born near Bologna in 1722, was a friend of Tiraboschi. Died in 1793.

See CAVALIERI, "Vita di Mingarelli," 1817.

Minghetti, mĕn-gĕt'tee, (MARCO,) an Italian statesman, born at Bologna, September 8, 1818. He had already obtained fame as a journalist and political economist, when in 1848 he was called to Rome, and became for a time minister of public instruction, but soon went north and joined the Sardinian army. He held various cabinet positions in the new kingdom of Italy, acting for several terms as prime minister, and wielding a great influence as an orator and writer. His principal work is "Della Economía pubblica," (1859.) Other works of his are "Opusculi letterari ed economici," (1872,) "Le Donne italiane nelle belle Arti," (1877,) and "La Chiesa e lo Stato," (1878.) Died December 10, 1886.

Mingotti, mĕn-got'tee, (REGINA,) an Italian singer, born at Naples, of German parents, in 1728. Her family name was VALENTINI. When a mere child she married an impresario named Mingotti, who recognized her vocal abilities and had her educated for the operatic stage. She made her first appearance in Dresden, and soon won a great reputation, which was extended by her tours in Spain, Italy, and England. Died in 1807.

Miniana, me-ne-ä'nä, (JOSÉ MANUEL,) a Spanish historian, born at Valencia in 1671. He wrote a continuation of Mariana's "History of Spain," (1733.) Died in 1730.

Minié, me'ne-ā', (CLAUDE ÉTIENNE,) a French officer, born in Paris in 1810, was the inventor of the rifle called by his name. He was appointed by Napoleon III. superintendent of the school of ordnance at Vincennes, and received from him the sum of 20,000 francs. The Minié rifle was an immense improvement on anything of the kind that had previously been invented, both as regards precision and the extent of its range. Died December 14, 1879.

Mino da Fiesole, mee'no dä fe-ĕs'o-lä, an eminent Italian sculptor, born at Fiesole about 1430. Among his works is a tomb of Paul II. at Rome. Died in 1486.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters and Sculptors."

Minoochihr, Minoutchihr, or Minûchihr, min-oo'chĭh'r, written also Manucheher, an ancient Persian king, the grandson (or, according to some authorities, the great-grandson) of Fereedoon, (Feridûn,) is said to have been the first of his nation who fortified cities with ramparts and ditches. With Minoochihr ended the glory and power of the Peshdadian dynasty.

Mī'nos, [Gr. Μίνως,] a celebrated king and lawgiver of Crete, whose history is much obscured or embellished with fable. According to Homer, he was a son of Jupiter and Europa, a brother of Rhadamanthus, and the father of Ariadne and Deucalion. He was renowned for his justice and moderation, and it was fabled that after his death he became a judge of the souls which entered the infernal regions. He has by some writers been identified with Manu, (or Menu,) the great Hindoo lawgiver.

Minos, a king and lawgiver of Crete, supposed to have been a grandson of the preceding, with whom, however, he has been confounded by some writers. He was the husband of Pasiphaë, and had many children. He is said to have been the first Greek prince that had an important naval power. The Cretans ascribed to Minos their laws and political institutions, which served as a model for the legislation of Lycurgus. According to one tradition, he was cruel and tyrannical, and compelled the Athenians, whom he vanquished, to pay him an annual tribute in the form of boys and virgins, who were devoured by the Minotaur.

Mī'not, (CHARLES SEDGWICK,) an American biologist, was born at Boston in 1852. He became assistant in histology and embryology at Harvard in 1887, and professor of these branches in 1892. He published "Human Embryology," (1892,) and many biological papers.

Mī'not, (GEORGE RICHARDS,) an American jurist and historian, born at Boston in 1758. His principal works are a "Eulogy on Washington," "History of Shays's Rebellion," and "History of Massachusetts Bay." Died in Boston, January 2, 1802.

Min'ọt, ? (LAURENCE,) an English poet, whose works were discovered by Tyrwhitt while he was preparing an edition of Chaucer. He lived about 1300–1352.

Min'o-taur, [Gr. Μινώταυρος; Lat. MINOTAU'RUS; Fr. MINOTAURE, me'no'tōr',] a monster of classic mythology, represented as half man and half bull. According to the legend, he was the offspring of Pasiphaë and a bull which was sent to Minos by Neptune; he was kept in the great labyrinth of Crete, was fed with youths and maidens whom the Athenians sent to Minos as tribute, and was finally killed by Theseus.

Min'thạ or Men'thạ, [Gr. Μίνθη,] a nymph, fabled to have been beloved by Pluto and changed by Ceres into the plant known as mint.

Minto, LORD. See ELLIOT.

Min'to, (WALTER,) a Scottish mathematician, born in Edinburgh, emigrated to America in 1786. He was the author of several scientific works, and became professor of mathematics at Princeton College, New Jersey. Died in 1796.

Mintrop, mĭn'trop, (THEODOR,) a distinguished German painter and designer, born at Heithausen, in Bavaria, in 1814. He produced designs in crayon, and several oil-paintings of religious subjects. Among his works are "The Riches of the Year," and "The Apotheosis of Bacchus." Died July 4, 1870.

Minturni, mĕn-toor'nee, (ANTONIO SEBASTIANO,) an Italian poet and canonist, born in Terra di Lavoro, was noted for his learning. Died in 1574.

Minut, de, dẹh me'nü', (GABRIEL,) a French littérateur, born at Toulouse about 1520. He was patronized by Catherine de Médicis, and was a friend of J. C. Scaliger. He published treatises on medicine, theology, and other subjects. Died in 1587.

Minutianus, me-nu-she-a'nus, [It. MINUZIANO, me noot-se-ä'no,] (ALESSANDRO,) a learned Italian printer, born at San Severo about 1450. He published the first complete edition of Cicero, and issued from his press numerous classics of great beauty and accuracy. Died about 1525.

Minutius or Minucius (mĭ-nu'she-us) Fe'lix, an early Christian writer, supposed to have been a native of Africa, lived in the third century. He was the author of a work entitled "Octavius," written in defence of Christianity. A good edition of it was published by Gronovius in 1707.

See BOUCHARD, "Dissertatio de Minutio Felice," 1685; HEINRICH MEIER, "Commentatio de Minucio Felice," 1825.

Minutoli, me-noo'to-lee, (HEINRICH MENU,) BARON, a distinguished writer, of Italian extraction, born at Geneva in 1772. He served in the Prussian army, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general. In 1820 he accompanied the scientific expedition sent by the Prussian government to Egypt, and published, (in German,) after his return, a "Journey to the Temple of Jupiter Ammon and Upper Egypt," (2 vols., 1824.) Among his other works is "Recollections of a Soldier." He was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, and was appointed by the king, Frederick William, tutor to Prince Charles. Died in 1846.

Minutoli, (JULIUS,) a lawyer, son of the preceding, was born at Berlin in 1805. He was appointed in 1851 consul-general for Spain and Portugal. He published a work entitled "Spain and its Progressive Development." Died November 5, 1860.

Min'ỹ-as, [Gr. Μινύας,] a fabulous personage, said to be a son of Neptune, a king of Bœotia, and the ancestor of the MINYÆ, (Μινύαι,) a race of heroes celebrated in the most ancient epic poetry of Greece. The Argonauts were mostly descendants of Minyas, and were called Minyæ.

Minzocchi, mĕn-zok'kee, or Menzocchi, mĕn-zok'kee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Forlì about 1500, was a pupil of Genga. Among his master-pieces we may name "The Sacrifice of Melchisedec," "The Fall of Manna," and a "Holy Family." Died in 1574.

Minzoni, mĕn-zo'nee, (ONOFRIO,) an Italian poet and Jesuit, born at Ferrara in 1734, became professor of philosophy at Venice. He was the author of a collection of sonnets of great beauty. Died in 1817.

See TIPALDO, "Biografia degli Italiani illustri."

Miolan-Carvalho, me'o'lŏN' kär'vä'lo', (CAROLINE

FÉLIX,) a French vocalist, born at Château-Roux in 1829. She performed with success in Paris and London as an operatic singer. Died July 10, 1895.

Miollis, me'o'lèss', (SEXTIUS ALEXANDRE FRANÇOIS,) COUNT, a French general, born at Aix in 1759. He was wounded at Yorktown, Virginia, in 1781. He became a general of division in 1799, and obtained command of all the French forces in Northern Italy in 1805. In 1809 he entered Rome, where, having expelled the pope, he remained, with the title of governor, until 1814. Died in 1828.

Mionnet, me'o'nȧ', (THÉODORE EDME,) a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1770. He wrote a "Descriptive Catalogue of Greek and Roman Medals," (7 vols., 1806-35,) a standard work, which still ranks among the best of its kind, a treatise "On the Rarity and Value of Roman Medals," etc., (2 vols., 1847,) and other similar works. Died in 1842.

Miot, me'o', (ANDRÉ FRANÇOIS,) Comte de Melito, a French statesman, born at Versailles in 1762. He was minister of the interior at Naples under Joseph Bonaparte. He died in 1841, leaving "Memoirs of the Consulate, the Empire, and King Joseph," (3 vols., 1858.)

Mirabaud, me'rȧ'bō', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1675. He made a translation of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," which had great popularity at the time. He also translated the "Orlando Furioso," and published several treatises on various subjects. The atheistical work entitled "Système de la Nature" was for a time attributed to Mirabaud, but is now known to have been written by Baron d'Holbach. Mirabaud was elected to the French Academy in 1726. Died in 1760.

See D'ALEMBERT, "Histoire des Membres de l'Académie Française."

Mirabeau, de, dẹh me'rȧ'bō', (BONIFACE RIQUETTI,) VICOMTE, a brother of Gabriel, noticed below, was born at Bignon in 1754. He served in the army of the United States about 1780. In 1789 he became a royalist member of the States-General, and was opposed to his brother in politics. He was so bloated by drinking that he was nicknamed "Barrel Mirabeau," ("Mirabeau Tonneau.") He was noted for his sarcastic wit. "In any other family," said he, "I should pass for a reprobate (mauvais sujet) and wit; but in mine I am regarded as a fool, but a sedate man." When his famous brother reproved him for his intemperance, he wittily replied, "Of all the vices of our family, that is the only one which you have left for me." He emigrated in 1790, and joined the royalist army on the Rhine. Died in 1792.

Mirabeau, de, dẹh me'rȧ'bō' or mîr'ạ-bō', (HONORÉ GABRIEL de Riquetti, dẹh re'kȧ'te',) originally Arrighetti,) COMTE, a famous French orator and statesman, was born at Bignon, near Nemours, March 9, 1749. His family was of Italian extraction. He was the oldest surviving son of the Marquis de Mirabeau and Marie Geneviève de Vassan. The last representative of that stormy and highly-gifted race, he inherited a passionate nature, a frank and open temper, and a mind of great amplitude of grasp and prodigious activity. The education which he received under the strict discipline of his father was far from judicious. In his fifteenth year he was sent to a boarding-school in Paris, where he made rapid progress in ancient and modern languages and mathematics, also in music and the fine arts. In compliance with his father's will, he entered the army in 1767. The next year, by an amorous intrigue, he provoked the ire of the marquis, who caused him to be imprisoned in the Isle of Rhé. In 1769 he obtained liberty to serve in Corsica against Paoli, where he won golden opinions, and returned in 1770 with the brevet of captain. It puzzled his father to find a proper sphere for one whom he called a windmill, a whirlwind, one who "had swallowed all formulas." On one occasion he writes, "I pass my life in cramming him with principles."

In 1772 young Mirabeau married Marie Émilie de Covet, a daughter of the Marquis de Marignan, and became a resident of Aix. For running into debt, he was banished to Manosque, near the Alps, where he wrote an "Essay on Despotism." Having again displeased the grim marquis by some venial error, he was confined, by a lettre de cachet, in the castle of If, in 1774, and was finally separated from his wife, who was not inconsolable on that account. He was removed in 1775 to the castle of Joux; and, having liberty to walk out on parole, he formed an ardent attachment for Sophie Monnier, unhappily married to a man four times older than herself. With her he eloped in 1776, and went to Amsterdam, where he earned fair wages by translating Watson's "Philip II." and doing other literary jobs. The parliament of Besançon indicted him for abduction, and sentenced him to death. In May, 1777, the police-officers arrested him in Holland and consigned him to the prison of Vincennes, where he was kept forty-two months, apparently ruined, but still indomitable in spirit. Presenting himself before the court which had condemned him as contumacious, he pleaded his cause with such power that the sentence was annulled. He again met his father on amicable terms; for it is recorded among his few conventional virtues that he loved his father to the end. The marquis, however, left him to his own resources for a supply of money.

From about 1783 to 1788 he led a wandering life in England, France, and Germany, supporting himself by his wits, teeming with grand projects, and often engaging in questionable intrigues. Under the auspices of Franklin, he published an eloquent essay "On the Order of Cincinnatus," (1784,) which was followed by a tract "On the Opening of the Scheldt." A polemical tract on the water-company of Paris, in reply to Beaumarchais, produced a prodigious effect. In 1786 Calonne (partly from a desire to remove him out of the way) sent him on a secret mission to Berlin, where he met the Great Frederick, and collected materials for an important work,—"The Prussian Monarchy,"—which appeared in 1788. The States-General, which were convoked for May, 1789, offered to him a congenial arena for the exertion of his gigantic energies against the system of organized injustice and oppression which for ages had afflicted France. After he had been rejected with contempt by the noblesse of Provence, he was chosen triumphantly by the Tiers-État of Aix and Marseilles. He preferred to represent Aix. Aiming at reform by moderate means, he made overtures for co-operation with the ministry, but was coldly received by Necker, and went away in ill humour. On the 23d of June, 1789, he gave a decisive direction to the Revolution by his famous speech in reply to the king's usher, De Brézé, who reminded the Assembly that the king had ordered them to disperse:—"The Commons of France have resolved to deliberate. We have heard what the king has been advised to say; and you, who cannot act as his organ in the States-General,—you, who have here neither seat nor vote nor right of speech,—you are not the person to remind us of it. Go and tell your master that we are here by the will of the nation, and that nothing but the power of bayonets can drive us hence!" The usher quickly vanished, and Mirabeau became the master-spirit of the National Assembly. "Mirabeau's spiritual gift," says Carlyle, "will be found to be verily an honest and great one; far the strongest, best practical intellect of that time." His brief and pithy sentences became the watchwords of the Revolution; "his gestures were commands, his motions were coups d'état." Exchanging the rôle of tribune for that of a statesman, he soared above the intrigues of party and the ideal abstractions that were in vogue. "Where others grope darkly," says Lamartine, "he aims surely, be advances directly. . . . The philosophy of the eighteenth century, modified by prudence and policy, flows out all formulized from his lips. His eloquence, imperative as law, is only the gift of impassioned reasoning."

He advocated the abolition of the double aristocracy of lords and bishops, the spoliation of the Church, and the formation of the national guard, but he demanded for the king an absolute veto and the initiative in making war and peace. One of his greatest triumphs as an orator was won over Barnave, on the latter question, in 1790. Loud explosions of popular fury greeted him when it was known that he favoured the royal veto. As he entered the Assembly to speak on the question, he said to a friend, "I will either leave the House in triumph, or be torn to fragments." He gained his point, and restored his popularity. In the last part of his career he became more conservative, and formed a secret alliance with the court, from which he received large sums of money. He doubtless cherished an ambition to be prime minister of France.

In January, 1791, he was chosen president of the National Assembly. "Never had this office been so well filled," says Dumont. On parting with Dumont, who left Paris at the date just named, Mirabeau said, "I shall die at the stake, and we shall never, perhaps, meet again. That base faction whom I now overawe [the Jacobins] will again be let loose upon the country. I have none but direful anticipations." He died April 2, 1791. Among his last words were, "Envelop me with perfumes and crown me with flowers, that I may pass away into everlasting sleep." His strong constitution had been ruined by inordinate passions and immoral pleasures carried to the greatest excess, but veiled under a decorous exterior after he had attained eminence as a legislator. He had the art of enlisting men of talents in his service and appropriating their productions, on which he impressed the seal of his originality. Dumont, Clavière, and Duroverai were, perhaps, the chief persons who thus assisted him. Mirabeau had given development and outward form to the French Revolution; but to control it was beyond his power. His indomitable will might for a time direct or overawe the fury of the populace; but he possessed no virtues which could inspire the better portion of the people with that trust and confidence without which there can be no stability for any government.

Alluding to the resemblance between Mirabeau and Chatham, Macaulay observes, "Sudden bursts which seemed to be the effect of inspiration, short sentences which came like lightning, dazzling, burning, striking down everything before them, . . . in these chiefly lay the oratorical power both of Chatham and Mirabeau. . . . In true dignity of character, in private and public virtue, it may seem absurd to institute any comparison between them; but they had the same haughtiness and vehemence of temper. In their language and manner there was a disdainful self-confidence, an imperiousness before which all common minds quailed. . . . There have been far greater speakers and far greater statesmen than either of them; but we doubt whether any men have, in modern times, exercised such vast personal influence over stormy and divided assemblies." (Article on "Dumont's Recollections of Mirabeau," in Macaulay's "Essays.")

Mirabeau, de, (JEAN ANTOINE RIQUETTI,) MARQUIS, surnamed SILVERSTOCK, a brave French officer, born in Provence in 1666, was the grandfather of the great orator Mirabeau. His ancestors, the Arrighettis, were exiled from Florence in 1267. He was called "Vendôme's right arm." At the battle of Cassano, in 1706, where he commanded a regiment, he received twenty-seven wounds, one of which was in the neck. In consequence of this, he wore a silver stock to support his head. He married, and lived many years after that action.

See "Mémoires de Mirabeau;" CARLYLE, "Essays," vol. i.

Mirabeau, de, (VICTOR RIQUETTI,) MARQUIS, the self-styled "Friend of Men," born at Perthuis in 1715, was the son of the preceding, and father of the great orator. A proud, eccentric person, of violent passions and powerful intellect, he was regarded as the reverse of a "friend" by most men who had intercourse with him. His hobby was Political Economy, in which he was a disciple of Du Quesnay. He published on that science able and voluminous works, some of which were received with favour. His "Friend of Men," ("Ami des Hommes,") which appeared about 1755, made a great sensation, though its style was extremely rugged, quaint, and tortuous. He lived mostly in Paris, and was ambitious to direct affairs of state. It is reported that he obtained from the ministry no less than fifty-four lettres de cachet, arbitrary warrants to imprison his children and others. Died in 1789. "Out of all which circumstances," says Carlyle, "there has come forth this Marquis de Mirabeau, shaped into one of the most singular, sublime pedants that ever stepped the soil of France. There never entered the brain of Hogarth or of rare old Ben such a piece of humour as in this brave old Riquetti nature has presented us ready-made. For withal there is such genius in him, rich depth of character, indestructible cheerfulness and health breaking out in spite of these divorce-papers, like strong sunlight in thundery weather."

Mirabella, me-rȧ-bel′lȧ, (VINCENZO,) an Italian antiquary, born at Syracuse in 1570. He wrote a "History of Syracuse," and other works. Died in 1624.

Miræus. See LEMIRE.

Miraflores, de, dȧ me-rȧ-flō′rĕs, (MANUEL de Pando,) MARQUIS, a Spanish historian, born at Madrid, December 24, 1792. He was several times sent on important embassies, and was in later life prominent as one of the principal ministers of the government. His chief works relate to the history and politics of his own times. Died in Madrid, March 17, 1872.

Miramon, me-rȧ-mōn′, (MIGUEL,) a Mexican general, born about 1832. He became the leader of the clerical party which began to wage war against Juarez in 1858. He was defeated in a decisive battle in December, 1860, and went into exile. He afterwards returned, and fought for Maximilian, and was executed with him in June, 1867.

Miranda, me-rȧn′dȧ, (FRANCISCO,) a South American patriot, born at Caraccas about 1750. Having entered the French army, he served in the American campaigns of 1779 and 1781, and in 1792 became general of division under Dumouriez. In the campaign of 1793 he was defeated by the allies at Neerwinden, and was brought to trial for mismanagement on this occasion, but he was acquitted. Being condemned by the Directory in 1797, he took refuge in England, and on his return to Paris, in 1803, was a second time banished. He sailed in 1806 to Venezuela, where he made an unsuccessful attempt to found a republic. He was arrested in 1812 by the Spanish government, and imprisoned at Cadiz, where he died in 1816.

See J. BIGGS, "History of Miranda's Attempt to effect a Revolution in South America;" DUMOURIEZ, "Mémoires."

Miranda, de, dȧ me-rȧn′dȧ, (Don JUAN GARCIA,) a Spanish artist, born at Madrid in 1677, became painter to the king, Philip V. Died in 1749. There were several other painters of the same family.

See CEAN-BERMUDEZ, "Diccionario Historico," etc.

Miranda, de, dȧ me-rȧn′dȧ, (SA,) one of the earliest Portuguese poets, born at Coimbra about 1495. He was one of the founders of Portuguese literature, and is said to have been the first to employ the metres of Dante and Petrarch. He was the author of sonnets and dramas, but his reputation rests chiefly on his poetical epistles and eclogues. Died in 1558.

Mirbel, de, dẹh mêr′bĕl′, (CHARLES FRANÇOIS BRISSEAU,) an eminent French botanist, born in Paris in 1776. He was appointed by the empress Josephine superintendent of the gardens of Malmaison in 1803, and in 1808 became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and adjunct professor of botany and vegetable physiology to the Faculty of Sciences. He afterwards held several public offices, and in 1828 was appointed professor of culture in the Jardin des Plantes. Among his principal works are "Elements of Botany and Vegetable Physiology," (3 vols., 1815,) and "Natural History of Vegetables," etc., (15 vols., 1826,) written in conjunction with Lamarck, also "Researches on the Marchantia Polymorpha," and other treatises of great value, contributed to the "Journal de Physique" and various other scientific periodicals. He likewise assisted Sonnini in his "Natural History of Plants." Mirbel gave great attention to structural botany, in which branch of the science he was really eminent, although his views have been to a great extent superseded. Died in 1854.

See PAYEN, "Éloge historique de M. de Mirbel," 1858; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mirbel, de, (LIZINSKA AIMÉE ZOÉ RUE,) the wife of the preceding, was born at Cherbourg in 1796. She acquired a high reputation as a miniature-painter. Among her best works may be named the portraits of Louis Philippe, the Duke of Orléans, the Count of Paris, Madame Guizot, and Émile de Girardin. She obtained several medals, and was appointed after the restoration miniature-painter to the king. Madame Mirbel ranks as one of the best of modern miniaturists. Her portraits are remarkable for correctness and finish, as well as for vigour and spirited expression and for harmony of colour. Died August 31, 1849.

See "Journal des Beaux-Arts," 1849.

Mirecourt, de, dẹh mĕr'koor', (EUGÈNE JACQUOT,) a French littérateur, born November 19, 1812. The latter part of his name was assumed from the name of his native village, Mirecourt, in the Vosges. He early adopted literature as a profession, and in 1845 attracted attention by an attack on Alexandre Dumas, entitled "The House of Alexandre Dumas & Co., Manufacturers of Novels." In 1854 he commenced the publication of a series of volumes under the general title of "Les Contemporains," which consisted of gossipy and semi-scandalous articles upon the literary celebrities of the hour. Many of these involved him in lawsuits. After one hundred volumes had been published, Mirecourt founded a weekly paper under the same title and with a similar aim. He also wrote a number of inferior romances. Died February 13, 1880.

Mirepoix, de, dẹh mĕR'pwȧ', (CHARLES PIERRE GASTON FRANÇOIS de Lévis—dẹh lȧ've',) DUC, a French general, born in 1699. He became a marshal of France in 1757. Died in 1758.

Mirevelt. See MIEREVELT.

Mir Hasan, meer hȧ'sạn, a poet of India, who lived at Fyzabad and Lucknow and died in 1786. He wrote (in the Urdu language) "The Magic of Eloquence," (a romance,) "The Rose-Garden of Iran," etc.

Mir'i-am, [Heb. מִרְיָם.] a prophetess, a sister of Moses, the Hebrew lawgiver. She sang a song of triumph after the children of Israel had passed through the Red Sea.

See Exodus xv. 20; Numbers xii.

Mirkhond, mir'kond', a celebrated Persian historian, born in 1433, was the author of a work entitled "Garden of Purity, or History of Prophets, Kings, and Caliphs." There are manuscripts of this history in the libraries of Paris, London, Berlin, and Vienna, and portions of it have been translated into French and several other languages. Died in 1498.

Mir Muhammadi Soz, meer mŭh-hăm'mȧ-dee sŏz, a Hindostanee poet, who lived at Lucknow, but became a dervish, and died in 1800. He wrote much elegant but licentious verse.

Miromesnil, de, dẹh me'ro'mȧ'nĕl', (ARMAND THOMAS HUE,) a French minister of state, born in the Orléannais in 1723. He was keeper of the seals from 1774 to 1787. Died in 1796.

Mir Taki, (or Taqi,) meer tȧ'kee, a Hindostanee (Urdu) poet, born at Agra. He lived mostly at Lucknow, and died in 1810. Many critics give him the first place in Urdu poetry, but others consider him inferior to Sauda. He left a great number of poems.

Mirza. See MEERZÂ.

Mī-se'nus, [Gr. Μισηνός; Fr. MISÈNE, me'zạn',] a Trojan warrior, distinguished for his valour and his skill as a trumpeter, was called ÆOL'IDES by Virgil. After the capture of Troy, he went to Italy with Æneas, whom he served as a trumpeter. He is said to have been drowned by a Triton who was envious of his musical skill.

See VIRGIL'S "Æneid," book vi. 162–174.

Misri-Effendi, mis'ree ĕf-fĕn'dee, a Turkish poet and enthusiast, born in Egypt about 1660. He celebrated in verse the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Died in 1710.

Missiessy, me'se'ȧ'se', (ÉDOUARD THOMAS BURGUES,) a French admiral, born in Provence in 1754. He commanded a squadron which, in May, 1805, was sent to the Antilles, and in 1809 commanded the naval forces at Antwerp. Died in 1832.

Misson, me'sôN', (FRANÇOIS MAXIMILIEN,) a French writer, born at Lyons, was of a Protestant family, and settled in England after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Having visited Italy in 1687, he published, after his return, an account of his travels, which was commended by Addison for its lively and faithful descriptions. Died in London, January 22, 1722.

Mistral, mès'trȧl', (FREDERI, or FRÉDÉRIC,) a French (Provençal) poet, born at Maillane, September 8, 1830. His most noted work is the pastoral epic "Mirèio," (1859; in English by H. Crichton, 1868, and by H. W. Preston, 1872,) which was the basis of Gounod's opera "Mireille," (1864.) He also wrote "Calendau, Pouémo nouveau," (1867,) and "Lis Isclo d'Or," ("The Golden Shoes," 1875.) Mistral is one of the principal members of the group of writers called felibres, (who aim at a restoration of Provençal literature,) and prepared a Provençal Dictionary.

Mitch'ęl, (JOHN,) an Irish adventurer, born in the county of Derry in 1815. He was for a time associate editor of the Dublin "Nation," and subsequently of "The United Irishman," which, however, was soon suppressed by the British government, and Mitchel was sentenced to fourteen years' banishment to Australia in 1848. In 1854 he escaped to the United States, and became an editor successively of "The Southern Citizen" and "The Richmond Examiner," violent pro-slavery and secession journals. In 1874 he returned to Ireland and was elected to Parliament, but before taking his seat he died, March 20, 1875.

Mitchel, (ORMSBY MACKNIGHT,) an eminent American astronomer, born in Union county, Kentucky, in 1810. Having graduated at West Point in 1829, he became in 1834 professor of mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy at Cincinnati College, Ohio. He first suggested the erection of an observatory at Cincinnati, and the successful accomplishment of the enterprise was chiefly due to his efforts; and the institution, of which he became director, was provided through his exertions with one of the finest telescopes to be found in the United States. He delivered popular lectures on astronomy at various places, and published, besides other works, "Planetary and Stellar Worlds," which was very favourably received. In 1859 he became director of the Dudley Observatory at Albany. He was appointed a brigadier-general in the Union army in August, 1861. He moved with a small army from Tennessee to Alabama in April, 1862, surprised Huntsville, and distinguished himself by his energy. Having been promoted to the rank of major-general, he was appointed commander of the department of the South, about August, 1862. He died of yellow fever at Beaufort, South Carolina, in October of that year.

Mitch'ell, (Sir ANDREW,) a distinguished diplomatist, born in Edinburgh about 1695, was elected to Parliament in 1747, and in 1751 was appointed resident minister at Brussels. He was ambassador-extraordinary to Berlin in 1753, and acquired considerable influence over Frederick the Great, whom he succeeded in detaching from the interests of France. Died in 1771.

See "Memoirs and Papers of Sir Andrew Mitchell," by A. BISSETT, 1850; THIÉBAULT, "Souvenirs de vingt Ans de Séjour à Berlin."

Mitchell, (ANDREW,) a Scottish naval officer, born about 1757, attained the rank of vice-admiral of the white in 1799, and in 1802 was appointed commander-in-chief on the coast of America. Died in 1806.

Mitchell, (Sir DAVID,) a naval commander under the reign of William III., rose to be rear-admiral of the blue in 1693. He was afterwards employed in important missions to Russia and Holland. Died in 1710.

Mitch'ell, (DONALD GRANT,) a distinguished American writer, born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1822.

Having graduated at Yale College in 1841, he made the tour of Europe, and published after his return, under the pseudonym of Ik Marvel, "Fresh Gleanings; or, A New Sheaf from the Old Fields of Continental Europe," (1847.) His principal works are "Reveries of a Bachelor," (1850,) "Dream Life," (1851,) "The Judge's Doings," (1854,) "My Farm of Edgewood," (1863,) "Wet Days at Edgewood," (1864,) "Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic," (1864,) "Dr. Johns," (1866,) "Rural Studies," (1867,) "About Old Story-Tellers," (1878,) and "English Lands, Letters, and Kings," (1889–95.)

Mitchell, (Elisha,) D.D., an American chemist and divine, born in Litchfield county, Connecticut, in 1793, became professor of mathematics in the University of North Carolina in 1817, and subsequently of chemistry in the same institution. Being appointed State surveyor, he first discovered the fact that the mountains of North Carolina are the highest in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains. While exploring one of these heights, in 1857, he was killed by a fall from a precipice. His name has been given to one of the highest summits.

Mitchell, (John Ames,) editor, was born at New York in 1845. He studied architecture, drawing, and painting, became an artist and illustrator, and in 1883 founded "Life," in New York, and became its editor. He published "The Romance of the Moon," "The Last American," "Life's Fairy-Tales," and other works.

Mitchell, (John Kearsley,) M.D., an American physician, born in Jefferson county, Virginia, in 1796. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1841 became professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. He published a treatise "On the Cryptogamous Origin of Malarious and Epidemic Fevers," (1849,) and lectures on scientific subjects, which are highly esteemed and have been translated into foreign languages. Died in 1858.

Mitchell, (Joseph,) a Scottish poet and dramatist, born about 1685, was the author of a tragedy entitled "The Fatal Extravagance," "The Highland Fair," a ballad opera, and a number of poems. Died in 1738.

Mitchell, (Margaret,) an American actress, born at New York in 1832. She was taken on the stage as an infant, and played child parts in her fifth year. She became highly popular in the title rôle of "Fanchon," produced in 1860, and later in other rôles.

Mitchell, (Maria,) LL.D., a distinguished American astronomer, born in the island of Nantucket in 1818. She published, besides other astronomical treatises, a memoir on a telescopic comet discovered by her in 1847. A gold medal was conferred upon her by the King of Denmark for this discovery. Miss Mitchell was appointed professor of astronomy at Vassar College soon after the opening of that institution in 1865, a position which she held until 1888. Died June 28, 1889.

Mitchell, (S. Weir,) M.D., an American physician and physiologist, a son of Dr. J. K. Mitchell, noticed above, was born at Philadelphia, February 15, 1829. He graduated at the Jefferson Medical College in 1850. He particularly distinguished himself by his researches on the chemical nature and physiological action of the venom of serpents, and wrote valuable papers on the venom of the rattlesnake, the circulation in the snapping-turtle, etc. He published "Wear and Tear," (1871,) "Fat and Blood," (1878,) etc., and, with Drs. Keen and Morehouse, "Effects of Gunshot Wounds," (1864.) Dr. Mitchell also won distinction as a novelist and poet, his works including several volumes of poems and the novels, "Hephzibah Guinness," (1880,) "In War Time," (1884,) "Far in the Forest," (1889,) "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," (1897,) "The Adventures of François," (1898,) etc., also "Characteristics," "When all the Woods are Green," and other works.

Mitchell, (Thomas,) an eminent English scholar, born in London in 1783. He studied at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and in 1813 began the publication of a series of essays on Aristophanes and Athenian manners, in the "Quarterly Review," which won for him a high reputation. He afterwards published an excellent translation of several comedies of Aristophanes into English verse; also an edition of Sophocles, and five dramas of Aristophanes, (with English notes.) He died in 1845, leaving unfinished an edition of his "Pentalogia Aristophanica."

Mitchell, (Sir Thomas Livingstone,) a Scottish traveller, born in Stirlingshire in 1792. He served in the Spanish campaigns from 1808 to 1814, and in 1827 sailed to Australia, where he was soon after appointed surveyor-general. He gave the name of Australia Felix to a region hitherto unexplored, and ascertained the courses of the Glenelg, the Darling, and other rivers. He published, among other works, "Outlines of a System of Surveying for Geographical and Military Purposes," (1827,) "Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia," etc., (2 vols., 1838,) and "Australian Geography," etc., (1850.) He was a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the Geographical Society. Died in 1855.

Mitchell, (Walter,) an American divine and littérateur, born at Nantucket, Massachusetts, in 1826. He is the author of "Bryan Maurice," a novel, and of several poems. Among the latter is the often-quoted "Tacking Ship off Shore."

Mitch'ill, (Samuel Latham,) M.D., LL.D., an American physician and naturalist, born on Long Island in 1764. In 1786 he graduated as doctor of medicine at the University of Edinburgh. He became in 1792 professor of chemistry, natural history, and philosophy in Columbia College, New York. He was for many years associate editor of the "Medical Repository." He was elected to the United States Senate in 1804, and in 1820 was appointed professor of botany and materia medica in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. He published "Observations on the Absorbent Tubes of Animal Bodies," and other scientific works. Died in 1831.

Mitelli, me-tel'lee, or Metelli, mā-tel'lee, (Agostino,) an Italian painter and engraver of great merit, born near Bologna in 1609, was a pupil of Dentone and Falcetta. His principal works are perspective and architectural pieces, in which his friend Michael Angelo Colonna painted the figures. Among their masterpieces are the frescos in the palace of Cardinal Spada at Rome. Mitelli died in 1660 at Madrid, whither he had been invited by Philip IV.

See Lanzi, "History of Painting in Italy."

Mitelli, (Giuseppe Maria,) an Italian painter and engraver, born in 1634, was a son of the preceding. His prints after Correggio and the Caracci are ranked among his best works. Died in 1718.

Mitford, (John Freeman,) an English statesman and jurist, born in 1748, was a brother of the historian, noticed below. He studied at New College, Oxford, and, having been admitted to the bar, was elected to Parliament for Beer-Alston in 1789. He became attorney-general in 1799, Speaker of the House of Commons in 1801, and in 1802 lord chancellor of Ireland, being created at the same time a peer, with the title of Baron Redesdale. On the death of Mr. Pitt he resigned his office of chancellor. Died in 1830.

Mitford, (Mary Russell,) a charming English writer, born in Hampshire in 1786. Her father was a physician of more than ordinary talent and culture, whose improvidence, however, and luxurious tastes had involved him in pecuniary embarrassment. In order to relieve his necessities, Miss Mitford devoted herself to authorship at an early age, and published in 1806 three volumes of poems, which met with severe criticism from some of the leading journals. Her next publications were the tragedies of "Julian," (1823,) "The Foscari," (1826,) "Rienzi," (1828,) and "Charles I.," several of which were favourably received. She had previously contributed to the "Ladies' Magazine" a series of sketches of English life, which appeared in 1832 under the title of "Our Village," etc., (5 vols.) The genial spirit, graceful simplicity, and freshness of feeling displayed in these tales won for them the favour of all classes, and they passed rapidly through many editions. Among Miss Mitford's other works we may name "Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town," "Stories of American Life by American Writers," "Recollections of a Literary Life," (3 vols., 1852,) and "Atherton, and other Tales," (1854.) Died in 1855.

See the "Life of Mary Russell Mitford, told by herself in Letters to her Friends," edited by the REV. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE, London, 1870; "Quarterly Review" for December, 1824; "Blackwood's Magazine" for June, 1854.

Mitford, (WILLIAM,) an English historian, born in London in 1744. He entered Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently studied law at the Middle Temple. He was appointed in 1769 a captain in the South Hampshire Militia, where he acquired the friendship of Gibbon, the future historian, at that time an officer in the same regiment. Mitford published in 1774 his "Inquiry into the Principles of Harmony in Languages," which was followed by a "Treatise on the Military Force," etc. Having visited France and Italy, he was appointed, after his return, lieutenant-colonel of the Hampshire Militia, (1779,) and was subsequently returned to Parliament, as a Tory, for Newport, Beer-Alston, and New Romney. He brought out in 1784 the first volume of his "History of Greece," completed in five volumes in 1818. Its style is characterized by great spirit and warmth of colouring, and displays uncommon learning and research, but it is strongly tinctured with the anti-democratic prejudices of the author. Died in 1827.

"The Athenian democracy," says an able critic in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," "is treated by him with extreme injustice. Scarcely anything can be imagined more partial or more false than his picture of the great conflict between Athens and Philip of Macedon. Philip, as he represents him, unites the perfections of a king, a hero, and an accomplished statesman; Demosthenes, on the contrary, is a demagogue, violent, venal, and dishonest." "Mitford's History of Greece is," says De Quincey, "as nearly perfect in its injustice as human infirmity will allow."

See MACAULAY, Review of "Mitford's History of Greece;" "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1808; "Quarterly Review" for April, 1821; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mĭth'ra or Mĭth'ras, [Gr. Μίθρας; Lat. MITH'RAS; Sanscrit, MĪT'RA or MĪTRAS,] a deity of the ancient Persians, usually regarded as the god of the sun; but he is more properly the god of day, and, in a higher and more extended sense, the god of light, presiding over the movements and influence of the principal heavenly bodies, including the five planets and the sun and moon. By the followers of Zoroaster he was regarded as the chief of the Izeds, (a class of angelic beings,) and in a particular manner as presiding over the light which mortals enjoy on earth, (but as distinct from the sun,) and as a mediator between men and Ormuzd. The primary signification of the Sanscrit Mitra is a "friend;" and Mithra would seem to be the representative of light as the friend of mankind and as the mediator between earth and heaven. In this character of mediator, as well as in some other respects, he would seem to approach the character of AGNI, (which see.) In the time of the emperors the worship of Mithra was introduced extensively into Italy and other parts of the Roman empire. He is usually represented as a handsome young man, seated or kneeling on a bull, into which he is thrusting the sacrificial knife; at his side are the evening and morning star, and near at hand a dog, a lion, and other animals, the signification of which is at present very imperfectly understood.

Mithridate. See MITHRIDATES.

Mith-rĭ-dā'tēs, [Gr. Μιθριδάτης or Μιθραδάτης; Fr. MITHRIDATE, me'tre'dăt',] a Persian name, borne by several kings of Pontus, who were descended from Artabazes, a Persian noble. It is supposed to be derived from Mithra, (the sun,) and signifies "given by the sun." Little is known of Mithridates I., who was the son of Ariobarzanes.

Mithridates II., the son of Ariobarzanes II., began to reign about 337 B.C. He extended his dominions by conquest, and was called the founder of the kingdom of Pontus. In a war with Antigonus he was defeated, made prisoner, and put to death, about 303 B.C.

Mithridates III., a son of the preceding, succeeded his father, and made conquests in Paphlagonia. He died after a reign of thirty-six years, and was succeeded by his son, Ariobarzanes III.

See CLINTON, "Fasti Hellenici."

Mithridates IV., of Pontus, the son of Ariobarzanes III., began to reign probably about 245 B.C., when he was a minor. He waged a successful war against Seleucus Callinicus, who, to obtain peace, gave him his own sister in marriage, with one or two provinces as a dowry. He is supposed to have died in 190 B.C. His successor was Pharnaces I.

Mithridates V., surnamed EVERGETES, was a grandson of the preceding, and a son of Pharnaces I., whom he succeeded in 156 B.C. He was a steadfast ally of the Romans, who ceded to him the province of Phrygia. After a peaceful reign, he died about 122 B.C.

Mithridates VI., King of Pontus, surnamed EU'PATOR, and more commonly called THE GREAT, born about 135 B.C., was the son of Mithridates V., whom he succeeded about the age of fifteen. He had great political and military talents, and is said to have been master of twenty-five languages. In the early part of his reign he found scope for his ambition in the conquest of Colchis and of the Scythian tribes which roamed on the north of the Euxine. His attempt to acquire Cappadocia by fraud and force was resisted by the Roman senate about 93 B.C. After forming an alliance with Tigranes, King of Armenia,—then the most powerful monarch of Asia,—he took the field in the year 88 with about 250,000 men, and defeated the Romans in several actions. In the same year he instigated a general massacre of the Romans resident in Asia Minor, of whom it was computed that 80,000 fell in one day.

In the year 87 he sent a large army into Greece, where he was opposed by Sulla and defeated at Chæronea, 86 B.C. Timbria, with another Roman army, invaded Bithynia and gained a decisive victory in the year 85. The next year Sulla and Mithridates made a treaty of peace, by which the latter abandoned his recent conquests. Muræna, who had obtained command of the Roman army, with some flimsy pretext renewed hostilities, and was completely defeated on the river Halys in 82 B.C. As the Roman senate had not ratified the treaty which he signed with Sulla, Mithridates made great preparations for war, which was renewed in 74, when two Roman armies, under Lucullus and Cotta, entered Bithynia. Defeated with great loss by Lucullus at Cyzicus and Cabiri, Mithridates, retarding the pursuit of the Romans by the riches he threw in their way, took refuge in the kingdom of Tigranes (who was his son-in-law) about 72 B.C., and gave orders that his wives Monima, Berenice, etc. should be put to death.

Tigranes, having espoused his cause, was defeated at Tigranocerta by Lucullus in 69, and at Artaxata in 68 B.C. Mithridates then entered Pontus, and in 67 B.C. gained a great victory over the Romans under Triarius, and recovered his kingdom. Lucullus, whose victorious career had been interrupted by a mutiny of his troops, was superseded in 66 by Pompey the Great, who soon terminated the war. After losing a battle, the King of Pontus fled to Lake Mæotis, (now the Sea of Azov,) and offered terms of peace, to which Pompey did not accede. While he was busy in raising a new army among the Scythians and other barbarous tribes, his son Pharnaces conspired against him, so that, to avoid the fate of a captive, he took poison, in the year 63 B.C. After Hannibal, Mithridates was the most formidable enemy Rome ever encountered. Cicero considered him superior in power and character to any other king against whom the Romans ever waged war.

Mith-rĭ-dā'tis, [Gr. Μιθριδάτις,] a daughter of the preceding, died with her father by taking poison, B.C. 63.

Mitre, mē'trȧ, (BARTOLOMÉ,) an Argentine president, born at Buenos Ayres, June 26, 1821, was a journalist in Montevideo during the early part of the nine years' siege, in which he also bore arms; went to Bolivia in 1846, taught in a military college, and fought against Peru; became a journalist in Valparaiso, was colonel of artillery in the decisive campaign against the tyrant Rosas in 1852, and became a leader in the movement for the independence of the state of Buenos Ayres from the remaining states of the Argentine Confederation. He was successively minister of war and governor, was defeated by President Urquiza at Cepeda in 1859, but overthrew him at Pavon, September 11, 1861, and became first President of the reorganized Argentine Republic. He was commander-in-chief of the "triple alliance" against Paraguay, 1865–70. He was distinguished as a poet, journalist, and novelist. Died at Buenos Ayres in 1894.

Mitscherlich, mĭtsh'ẹr-lĭk', (CHRISTOPH WILHELM,) a distinguished German scholar, born in Thuringia in 1760, was professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Göttingen. He published in 1800 an excellent edition of the Odes and Epodes of Horace. Died in 1854.

Mitscherlich, (EILARD,) an eminent German chemist, born near Jever in 1794. He studied at Heidelberg and Göttingen, and in 1819 was invited to Stockholm by Berzelius, whose notice he had attracted by his valuable discoveries in isomorphism. After his return to Germany (1821) he became professor of chemistry at the University of Berlin, and a member of the Academy of Sciences in that city. He was chosen a member of the French Institute in 1852. He published a "Treatise on Chemistry," ("Lehrbuch der Chimie," 2 vols., 1829–40,) which has a very high reputation, and wrote contributions to Poggendorf's "Annalen" and to other journals. Died in 1863.

Mittarelli, mĕt-tȧ-rel'lee, (NICCOLÒ JACOPO, afterwards GIOVANNI BENEDETTO,) an Italian theologian, born in Venice in 1707. He wrote a "History of the Camaldules," ("Annales Camaldulenses," 9 vols., 1755–73,) a work of some merit. Died in 1777.

Mittermaier, mit'tẹr-mī'ẹr, (KARL JOSEPH ANTON,) a celebrated German statesman and jurist, born in Munich in 1787. He was successively professor of law at Bonn and Heidelberg, president of the preparatory parliament at Frankfort in 1848, and soon after member of the National Assembly. He published a number of valuable legal treatises, among which we may name "The Common Civil Process of Germany compared with that of Prussia and France," (1826.) Died August 29, 1867.

Mitzler (or Mizler) von Kolof, mĭts'lẹr fon ko'lof, (LORENZ CHRISTOPH,) a German writer on music, born in Anspach in 1711. He published a "Musical Library," ("Musikalische Bibliothek," 4 vols., 1736–54,) and other works. Died at Warsaw in 1778.

Miv'art, (SAINT GEORGE,) an English naturalist, born in London, November 30, 1827. He was educated at King's College, London, and Saint Mary's College, Oscott, and became a Roman Catholic in 1844. In 1851 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn. In 1874 he was made professor of biology in the (Catholic) University College at Kensington, and in 1890 of the philosophy of natural history at Louvain. While an evolutionist, he was an active opponent of the Darwinian theory. Among his books are "Genesis of Species," (1871,) "Man and Apes," (1873,) "Lessons from Nature," (1876,) "The Cat," (1881,) "Nature and Thought," (1883,) "The Origin of Human Reason," (1889,) "Birds," (1892,) "Types of Animal Life," (1893,) etc. In 1899 his expression of disbelief in certain Biblical stories led to a sharp controversy with Cardinal Vaughan, and on his death, April 1, 1900, his body was refused burial in consecrated ground.

M'Kinley, (WILLIAM.) See MACKINLEY.

Mnasalcas, nȧ-sȧl'kȧs, [Gr. Μνασάλκας,] an epigrammatic poet, a native of Sicyon, supposed by some to have lived in the time of Alexander the Great.

Mœris, mee'ris, or Myris, mī'ris, [Gr. Μοῖρις or Μύρις,] a king of Egypt, who, according to Herodotus, reigned about 1400 B.C. He is said to have been a pacific monarch, and to have adorned the kingdom with many monuments and temples, at Thebes, Edfou, etc.

Mœris Ælius, mee'ris ee'lĭ-us, a Greek lexicographer, surnamed ATTICISTA, is supposed to have lived in the time of Adrian. His only work extant is a "Lexicon Atticum," or vocabulary of Attic and Hellenic words.

Mof'fat, (JAMES CLEMENT,) D.D., a Scottish-American clergyman, born at Glencree, in Galloway, May 30, 1811. He came to America in 1833, and graduated at Princeton College in 1835, and afterwards studied at Yale College. He was then for two years a tutor at Princeton, professor of Greek and Latin in Lafayette College, 1839–41, of Latin and history in Miami University, 1841–52, professor of Greek and Hebrew in Cincinnati, 1852–53, of Latin in Princeton, 1853–54, and of Greek, 1854–61, and professor of church history at Princeton after 1861. Among his works are "Introduction to the Study of Æsthetics," (1856,) "Life of Chalmers," "Comparative History of Religions," (1871,) "Summer Ramble in Scotland," (1873,) "Alwyn, a Poem," (1875,) "The Church in Scotland, a History," (1882,) "General Church History in Brief," (1884,) etc. Died in 1890.

Mof'fat, (ROBERT,) a Scottish missionary, born near Edinburgh in 1795, set out for Africa about 1816. He spent more than twenty years in the southern part of that country, and about 1840 published "Missionary Labours and Scenes in Southern Africa." He also translated the New Testament and Psalms into the Bechuana tongue. Mr. Moffat was father-in-law of the African explorer, Dr. Livingstone. Died Aug. 10, 1883.

Mogilas, mo-hee'läs, (PETROS,) a Russian prelate, of a Wallachian family, born about 1600. He studied in Paris, became a monk in 1625, and in 1632 was consecrated Metropolitan of Kieff. He prepared a "Catechism," (1645,) and the celebrated "Orthodox Confession" of 1640, adopted as a standard by the patriarchs and synods of the Greek Church. Died in 1647.

Mohallal, mo-häl'läl, (Ada-Ben-Rebiah,) an Arabian poet, born at Diarbekir, lived about 600 A.D. He first fixed the rules and metre of Arabian poetry. He was an uncle of the poet Amrool-Kais.

Mo-hăm'med or Ma-hom'et, written also Mohamed and Muhammed, [Arabic pron. mo-ham'med; Fr. MAHOMET, mä'o'mä'; Ger. MOHAMMED, mo-hăm'mĕt, or MUHAMMED, mōō-hăm'mĕt; It. MAOMETTO, mä-o-met'to, or MACOMETTO, mä-ko-met'to; Lat. MOHAM'MED or (rarely) MOHAM'MEDES, (gen. of both, MOHAMMEDIS,) or MUHAMMED; Port. MAFOMA, mä-fo'mä; Sp. MAHOMET, mä-o-mĕt',] a celebrated religious teacher and pretended prophet, the founder of one of the most widely diffused religions of the globe, was born at Mecca about 570 A.D. The year of his birth is not positively ascertained; the authorities are divided between 571 and 569, but the former date appears to be generally regarded as the more probable one. Both his parents belonged to the Koreish, at that time the most influential of all the Arabian tribes. His father, Abdallah, who was of the family of Hâshem, was regarded as the handsomest youth of his time. He married A'mĭnah, of the noble family Zohrah. Their only child was Mohammed, the future prophet. Amĭnah possessed, it is said, a peculiarly nervous temperament, and used to fancy, while between sleeping and waking, that she was visited by spirits. It is probable that Mohammed inherited from his mother his constitutional tendency to epilepsy, as well as his most remarkable mental peculiarities. Many marvellous stories are told of the circumstances attending his birth. It is related, among other things, that his mother experienced none of the pangs of travail. As soon as her child was born, he raised his eyes to heaven, exclaiming, "There is no God but God, and I am his prophet!" That same night the fire of Zoroaster, which, guarded by the Magi, had burned uninterruptedly for more than a thousand years, was suddenly extinguished, and all the idols in the world fell down.†

* This name is often pronounced, especially by the poets, mah'ho-met' or mä'ho-met, an accentuation derived, in all probability, from the French. (See Introduction, page 13.) Mahom'et (with the accent on the penultima) is not only the prevailing English pronunciation, but it corresponds more nearly with the Arabic.

When his son was only two months old, Abdallah died; (according to some accounts, he died two months before the birth of Mohammed.) Amĭnah for a short time nursed her infant herself, but sorrow soon dried the fountains of her breast, and the young child was committed to the care of Haleemah, (Halĭmah,) a shepherd's wife, with whom he remained about five years. It is related that when Haleemah showed the child to a celebrated soothsayer, (Kâhin,) who was an idolater, the latter exclaimed, "Kill this child!" Haleemah snatched away her precious charge and fled. Afterwards the Kâhin explained to the excited multitude: "I swear by all the gods," said he, "that this child will kill those who belong to your faith; he will destroy your gods, and he will be victorious over you." When Mohammed was four years old, he was seized, while at play, with a nervous fit, which was supposed to be epilepsy. As this disease was ascribed to supernatural influence, his nurse was alarmed, and was anxious to return him to his mother; but she was at last prevailed on to keep him somewhat longer. When he had completed his sixth year, his mother died. For the next two years he lived with his grandfather, Abd-el-Mŏŏttalib, who appears to have regarded him with great fondness. At his death, Abd-el-Mŏŏttalib recommended the orphan to the care of his son, the noble-minded Aboo-Tâlib.

When only twelve years old, Mohammed accompanied his uncle on a trading expedition to Syria. Near Bostra they met with an Arabian monk named Baheerâ or Sergius. It is said that Aboo-Tâlib, for some reason not explained, found it necessary to send the young Mohammed home again, and that Sergius took charge of him and accompanied him to Mecca. Early Christian biographers assert that Mohammed received his revelations from this monk; and he himself tells us in the Koran that he was accused of having been taught by a foreigner. It is not improbable that on his different journeys to Syria he learned many facts respecting the religions of Western Asia; but how far the knowledge of such facts influenced his future career must ever remain a subject of conjecture.

When Mohammed was twenty-five years of age, his uncle, Aboo-Tâlib, proposed to him that he should take charge of the merchandise which Khadĭjah, (or Khadee'-jah,) a rich widow of Mecca, was about to send to the markets of Syria. He accepted the proposal, and appears to have fulfilled his charge with judgment and with entire fidelity. Khadĭjah was so well pleased with him on his return that she offered him her hand. Although she was forty (lunar) years of age, and he but twenty-five, it was considered by the family of Mohammed as a very desirable connection. Their nuptials were celebrated with a magnificent feast and great rejoicings. This marriage raised Mohammed to an equal position with the wealthiest inhabitants of Mecca. His moral character, moreover, appears to have inspired universal esteem and confidence, and he was generally known by the surname of El-Ameen, (El-Amĭn,) or "the Faithful." For several years after his marriage he continued his commercial journeys, visiting, with the caravans, the Arabian fairs and markets of Syria. But, being now above the necessity of anxiously toiling for a subsistence, he had leisure to give free scope to the natural tendency of his mind, which inclined him to religious meditation and speculation. "He had," says Carlyle, "no school learning; of the thing we call school learning, none at all. The art of writing was but just introduced into Arabia; it seems to be the true opinion that Mahomet never could write. Life in the desert, with its experiences, was all his education."

Until his fortieth year Mohammed appears to have been a devout worshipper of the gods of his fathers. About this time he began to entertain serious scruples respecting the worship of idols. His followers ascribe the change to a divine revelation; but others have suggested that his scruples were probably excited by a more extensive acquaintance with the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, which he may have acquired from his wife's cousin, War'ăkă, who had, it is said, once been a Jew and afterwards became a Christian, and who made withal some pretensions to astrology. Supposing these conjectures to have a basis of truth, it was perhaps fortunate for the new prophet's claims to an original revelation that Warăkă died a short time before Mohammed publicly proclaimed his divine mission. But, however his thoughts may have been first directed to the subject of religion, there is every reason to believe that he was, at least in the early part of his career, sincere and unselfish in his desire to convert his countrymen to a better faith. He appears to have thought long and deeply, and to have had many mental struggles, before he resolved to announce himself as a divine teacher. He was of a nervous and melancholic temperament, and there were times, during the period of doubt and conflict which preceded the annunciation of his great mission, when he was strongly tempted to commit suicide by throwing himself down from a precipice. (See Sprenger's "Life," p. 105.) In all his trials he found a great support in his faithful wife Khadĭjah, who was the first, as he himself declared, among all his nation that believed in him. "God thus ordained it," says Ibn Ishâk, "that his duties might be made easy to him; for, as often as he had to hear reproachful language, or was accused of falsehood, or was cast down, she cheered him up and inspired him with courage, saying, 'Thou speakest the truth.'" We may well suppose, with Carlyle, that "of all the kindnesses she had done him, this of believing the earnest, struggling word which he now spoke was the greatest." For a considerable time Mohammed preached his new doctrines respecting the unity and glorious attributes of God to his household and intimate friends only. In three years he had made, we are told, only fourteen converts; but among these were the high-spirited, devoted, and indomitable Alee, (Alĭ,) who was afterwards surnamed the "ever-victorious Lion of God," (see ALEE,) and Aboo-Bekr, whose character for good sense, benevolence, and straightforward integrity contributed not a little to the respectability and ultimate success of the new religion.

In the fourth year of his mission, in obedience, as he alleges, to an express command from heaven, Mohammed resolved to make a public declaration of his faith. He addressed himself to the Koreish and others, asking them, "If I were to tell you that there is an army on the other side of that mountain, would you believe me?" "Yes," they answered, "for we do not consider thee to be a liar." He then said, "I come to warn you; and if you do not believe me, a great punishment will befall you;" he told them they must renounce idolatry, and make a profession of the one true God; that unless they did so they could have no true happiness in this life nor salvation in the life to come. He formally separated himself from the polytheists, and publicly condemned their religion. A powerful opposition was in consequence organized against him,—his uncle, Aboo Lahab, (lâh'hab,) and Aboo-Sofiân, (of the family of Omeyyah,) the principal leader of the Koreishites, being among the number of his bitterest enemies. Not only the prophet himself, but his disciples were for a time in extreme danger; he owed his life to the influence of the powerful family of Hâshem, and especially to the magnanimity, courage, and indomitable firmness of his uncle, Aboo-Tâlib, who, although he refused to accept the new faith, resolved, at whatever cost, to protect his kinsman. Every form of persuasion and menace was tried upon him in vain. To the hostile Koreishites, who urged him to give up to their vengeance the blasphemer of his country's gods, he answered with indignant scorn, and declared that if they should slay his nephew the lives of the chiefs of their tribe should pay for the life of Mohammed. They were thunder-struck at his boldness and awed by his invincible determination. But, while they hesitated to provoke the vengeance of the Hâshemites by laying violent hands upon Mohammed, they persecuted his disciples in a hundred ways, insulting and imprisoning those of the better class, and starving and torturing such as had no wealth, position, or family connections to protect them. Under the pressure of this persecution many converts to the new faith apostatized; and Mohammed, fearing that others might desert him, advised some of his followers to leave Mecca and seek refuge in Abyssinia, which was ruled, he said, by a just and pious king. The subsequent conduct of the Abyssinian monarch proved that the confidence of the prophet was not misplaced.

In spite of all opposition, the new doctrines continued to spread. In the sixth year of Mohammed's mission two important conversions took place,—the prophet's kinsman Hamzah, surnamed, on account of his bravery, the "Lion of God," and Omâr, who had at first been a bitter opponent of the Islâm, but afterwards became one of its most zealous and powerful defenders. (See OMAR.)

Ten years after the commencement of his mission, (that is, about 619 A.D.,) Mohammed lost by death his generous and faithful wife, Khadîjah, and his noble-minded uncle and protector, Aboo-Tâlib. He appears to have been greatly cast down by these severe afflictions, and seldom went out of his house. Meanwhile, his enemies seemed to have become more exasperated than ever by the failure of all their efforts to prevent the spread of the new religion. In this extremity, his uncle, Aboo-Lahab, who had hitherto been one of his most determined and bitter opponents, but upon whom now devolved the duty of protecting his kinsman, came forward with singular magnanimity and said to Mohammed, "Go wheresoever thou wilt, and do what thou wast accustomed to do when Aboo-Tâlib was alive: I swear by the gods of my country that no harm shall befall thee while I live." But a few days afterwards some one said to Aboo-Lahab, "Do you know what your nephew says of your father? he says he is in hell." Aboo-Lahab asked Mohammed if the charge was true. The prophet had the hardihood to answer, "Your father died an idolater; and every idolater goes to hell." Upon this, Aboo-Lahab withdrew his protection.

So long as Khadîjah lived, Mohammed may be said to have been a strict monogamist. Shortly after her death the daughter of Hakeem and wife of Othmân asked the prophet why he did not marry. "Whom shall I marry?" said he. She replied, "If thou wishest a virgin, take Ayeshah, the daughter of Aboo-Bekr; if a widow, take Sawdah, the daughter of Zamah,—she believes in thee." He instantly replied, "I will marry them both."

After Mohammed was abandoned by Aboo-Lahab, another uncle, El-Abbâs, (the brother of Aboo-Tâlib, and ancestor of the Abbasside caliphs,) became his protector. Meanwhile the faith which had been rejected at Mecca was eagerly embraced in the neighbouring city of Medina. A numerous and powerful deputation from the most influential families of the latter city waited on the prophet, and in a solemn covenant promised, with an oath, that if he would come and live with them they would protect him as they would protect their own wives and children. The offer of this powerful aid did not come a moment too soon. His enemies, headed by Aboo-Sofiân, had been unremitting in their efforts to procure his destruction. At length it was formally and publicly resolved that he should be slain. In order to baffle the vengeance of the Hâshemites, and to divide the guilt of his death, it was agreed that one man from every family should at the same moment plunge his sword into the heart of their victim. Nothing now remained for him but death or instant flight. At the dead of night, accompanied by his faithful friend Aboo-Bekr, he silently escaped from his house. The generous and devoted Alee, covered with the shawl of the prophet, laid himself down on the bed of his master. Meanwhile Mohammed and Aboo-Bekr had fled to the cave of Thor, about a league from Mecca: there they remained three days. According to one account, their enemies, after exploring every hiding-place in the vicinity, came to the mouth of the cave. But, a spider having providentially spread her web over the entrance, the Koreishites, deeming it impossible that Mohammed could have entered there, turned back from their pursuit. Perhaps a more probable explanation is that as the Koreishites knew Medina to be the destination of the fugitives, they never suspected that they could be concealed in the cave of Thor, which lay in an opposite direction. While they were in the cave, Aboo-Bekr, contrasting their weakness with the strength of their enemies, said, trembling, "We are but two." "No," replied Mohammed, "there is a third: it is God himself." On the fourth night the prophet and his companion left their hiding-place, and, riding on camels which the servant of Aboo-Bekr had brought, arrived safely at Medina sixteen days after his flight from Mecca. His approach having been made known, several hundred of the citizens went out to meet him. He was welcomed with loud acclamations; and he who a few days before had left his native city as a fugitive, with a price upon his head, now entered Medina more like a king returning victorious from battle than an exile seeking a place of refuge. This separation or flight of Mohammed from the city of his nativity (called in Arabic Hej'rah or *Hij'rah) marks the commencement of the Mohammedan era.†

After Mohammed's arrival at Medina, a marked change took place in his policy. He had hitherto asserted liberty of conscience and opposed religious violence. He now maintained that the Islâm should, if necessary, be defended and propagated by the sword. "The sword," said he, "is the key of heaven and of hell: a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, or a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting and prayer; whoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven him, and at the day of judgment the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of cherubim." He was not long in carrying his new principles into practice. His arch-enemy, Aboo-Sofiân, had, with only thirty or forty followers, conducted a rich caravan of a thousand camels to the marts of Syria. The prophet resolved to intercept it on its return. Aboo-Sofiân, having been informed of his design, dispatched a messenger to Mecca and obtained a reinforcement of nearly a thousand men. Mohammed's troops amounted to considerably less than half that number. The hostile forces met in the vale of Bedr, (or Bedder,) about twenty miles from Medina. Mohammed was placed on a throne or pulpit whence his eye could command the field of battle. His followers, being outnumbered, were sorely pressed. At that critical moment the prophet started from his throne, mounted his horse, and threw a handful of dust into the air towards the Koreishites, crying, "Let their faces be covered with confusion!" Both armies heard his voice; the Koreishites were stricken with terror, while the Mussulmans, assured of victory, rushed forward with an enthusiasm that was irresistible. Some of the Moslem writers state that when the prophet cast dust into the air three thousand angelic warriors on white and black steeds made their appearance and swept his foes before them like a whirlwind. Seventy of the Koreishites were killed, and about the same number taken prisoners. Among the slain was Aboo-Jahl, perhaps the most bitter and ferocious of all the enemies of Islâm. His head was brought to Mohammed, who exclaimed with exultation, "This man was the Pharaoh of our people." So great was the terror and hatred he had inspired that even after his death his name was never mentioned, it is said, by true believers without the addition, "May he be accursed of God!"

* This word is often, but less correctly, written Hegira: it has, properly speaking, but two syllables. The vowel i has doubtless been added by the Italians or Germans to indicate the sound of j, (or g soft.) REISKE, in his Latin version of Aboolfedâ's (Abulfedâ's) "Moslem Annals," ("Annales Moslemici,") invariably employs gi or gi to represent the sound of our j: thus, he writes for Khadijah Chadigja, for Aboo-Jahl Abu-Gjahl, etc.

† The era of the Hejrah is not calculated from the very day of Mohammed's flight, but from the beginning of the lunar year in which it occurred, namely, July 16, 622 A.D.

The prophet's success at Bedr was the first of that wonderful series of victories which, by spreading the new faith to the borders of China on the east and to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, were destined to change the face of the world. The Islâmites were less successful in a second encounter with their foes, near Mount Ohod, six miles north of Medina. Mohammed himself was wounded in the face with a javelin, two of his teeth were shattered with a stone, and seventy of the faithful, including Hamzah, the prophet's uncle, were left dead on the field of battle. But his enemies gained no permanent advantage. The Koreishites signally failed in an attempt to take Medina by siege. The Islâm constantly gained new adherents. "Caled [Khâled] and Amrou," says Gibbon, "the future conquerors of Syria and Egypt, most seasonably deserted the sinking cause of idolatry." Soon after, Mecca itself was taken by the followers of the prophet, who, led by Khâled, (surnamed afterwards, on account of his valour, the "Sword of God,") entered the city in three divisions. The chiefs of the Koreish were prostrate at the feet of the prophet. "What mercy," asked he, "can you expect from the man whom you have so deeply wronged?" "We trust to the generosity of our kinsman." "And you shall not trust in vain: go; you are safe, you are free." He who seven years before had left his native city as a hunted fugitive was now received and honoured as prophet and king. But in an attempt made soon after to reduce the Arabian tribes who still adhered to idolatry, the army of Mohammed was surprised in a mountain-pass, and for a time his own life was in imminent peril. Several of his devoted followers who endeavoured to shield him with their bodies fell dead at his feet. In his distress he cried, "O my brethren, I am the apostle of truth! O man, stand fast in the faith! O God, send down thine aid!" His uncle Abbâs, who was distinguished for the strength of his voice, called on the flying Moslems, repeating the promises of God to the faithful. The battle was soon restored, and what threatened to be a disastrous defeat was changed into a complete victory. About the year 630 Mohammed sent an army, under the command of Zeid, who had formerly been his slave, to invade Palestine, then belonging to the Greek empire. At the battle of Muta, where for the first time the Moslems encountered a foreign foe, Zeid and two other of the leaders were slain. It is related of Jaafar, who succeeded Zeid in the command of the army, that when his right hand was struck off he seized the banner with his left; this also being severed from his body, he embraced the standard with his bleeding stumps, until at length he fell, pierced with no fewer than fifty wounds. The day was saved by the valour of Khâled, in whose hand it is said that nine swords were broken before the hosts of the enemy were turned backward. Mohammed had to bewail, on this occasion, not only the death of his faithful servant Zeid, but also that of many of his bravest followers. We are told that when, after the battle, he first saw the young orphaned daughter of Zeid, he wept over her in speechless sorrow. "What do I see?" said one of his astonished followers. "You see," said he, "a friend weeping the loss of his most faithful friend."

The recent successes of the prophet, by inflaming the zeal of the faithful, confirming the wavering, and convincing the doubtful,—for, as it has been well observed, there is no argument like success,—contributed greatly to the rapid diffusion and final triumph of the new faith. But in the early part of 632, while he was engaged in organizing a formidable expedition against Syria, he was seized with a violent malady, (supposed by some writers to have been a fever,) which, before many days, terminated fatally. It is related that near the beginning of this illness Mohammed said to one of his attendants, "The choice is given me either to remain on earth until the end of time, or soon to depart to the presence of God: I have chosen the latter." When he perceived that his end was near, supported by the arms of Alee and another relative, he went into the mosque and asked publicly if he had injured any one,—if so, he was ready to make full amends, or to suffer himself what he had inflicted on others. As no one answered, he asked again if he owed any man anything. A voice replied, "Yes,—to me, three drachms of silver." The prophet ordered the money to be paid, and thanked his creditor that he made his complaint now instead of deferring it till the day of judgment. His last words were the utterance of a broken prayer,—"O God, pardon my sins—yes—I come!" He died, according to the Arabian historians, on his birthday, the eleventh year of the Hejrah, (632 A.D.,) aged 63, or, according to some authorities, 65 years. He had ceased to breathe, but his followers refused to believe that he was dead. Omăr, in his fierce zeal, threatened to strike off the heads of the infidels who should dare to assert that the great prophet and intercessor with God was no more. The authority of Aboo-Bekr was required to appease the tumult. "Is it Mohammed, or the God of Mohammed, whom you worship? God liveth for ever and ever; but Mohammed, though his prophet and apostle, was mortal like ourselves, and, in dying, has but fulfilled his own prediction."

In person Mohammed was of middle stature, with broad shoulders and chest, square-built and strong, with large hands and feet. The unusual size of his head was partly concealed by long and slightly-curling locks of hair. His forehead was broad and fair for an Arab, and his fine eyebrows were separated by a vein which swelled up and became very conspicuous when he was angry. His eyelashes were long, and his eyes dark and glowing. His nose was large, prominent, and slightly hooked; his mouth was wide, but adorned with a fine set of teeth. According to some accounts, he stooped, and was slightly round-shouldered. His natural disposition appears to have been in a high degree kindly and humane. "He was naturally irritable," says Irving, "but had brought his temper under great control." One of his servants said, "I served him from the time I was eight years old, and he never scolded me, though things were sometimes spoiled by me." "He was," says a writer* who will scarcely be accused of exaggerating his virtues, "kind to women,—never beat one, and entertained more respect for them than is usual with nations addicted to polygamy. He frequently protected women who came to him for refuge. . . . He forbade the believers to beat their wives; but on the remonstrance of Omăr, who said that the wives would have the upper hand over their husbands, he allowed it." Nevertheless, he insisted that women should be fairly and justly treated, and not beaten unless the occasion absolutely demanded it. His own wives, having once become rebellious, were brought to submission by a revelation from Heaven and the blows of their relatives,† the prophet himself being disinclined to such severity, either from kindness of heart or from a regard to his apostolic dignity.

"He was," says Sprenger, "affectionate towards his relations; and, notwithstanding the gravity of his office, he was playful with his wives. Ayeshah, being only nine years of age when she married him, brought her toys into his house, and he occasionally played with her. She also used to race with him. . . . He would sometimes tell stories to his wives, such as the adventures of the man who had been carried away by the jinn (genii) and, after a long stay with them, returned to his family."

The intellectual powers of Mohammed were of a very high order, and as a poet he ranks far above all others who have ever written in the Arabic tongue. It was usual for his followers to point to the beauty and sublimity of the Koran as an irrefutable proof of his divine inspiration; and he himself, in one of the chapters of that sacred poem, boldly challenges men and angels to produce anything to equal it, and confidently affirms that God alone could have dictated so incomparable a work. Probably no poet that ever lived more fully realized the state of mind known as poetic furor than Mohammed. It is said that while he was composing certain portions of the Koran he was in a state of such intense excitement as amounted almost to frenzy; and, if we may believe those accounts of his life which seem best authenticated, some at least of the revelations of the Koran were actually communicated (or were believed by him to have been communicated) during his epileptic paroxysms, while wholly unconscious of things around him. With this view, there may have been no arrogance or vanity in his claiming that to rival the Koran was beyond the power of men or angels. Referring to the prophet's tendency to poetic and elevated thought, Sprenger says, "His mind dwelt constantly on the contemplation of God: he saw his finger in the rising sun, in the falling rain, in the growing crop; he heard his voice in the thunder, in the murmuring of the waters, and in the hymns which the birds sing to his praise; and in the lonely deserts and ruins of ancient cities he saw the traces of his anger." But combined with all his poetic and religious enthusiasm was a vein of strong common sense. He was free from all ostentation and parade: that he pretended to work miracles, is a calumny of his enemies. He considered it miracle enough that he was inspired with the Spirit of God: this he doubtless believed in all sincerity. One whom Heaven had so highly honoured had no need of earthly dignity or worldly splendour. He set a praiseworthy example of indifference to earthly riches, of patriarchal simplicity of manners, and of frugality in his diet and dress. With his own hands he milked his goats, and afterwards attended to his person. The costly presents which he received he gave to his friends. The riches which he obtained from the spoils of war and from tribute were spent in promoting the interests of religion and in relieving the wants of the poor. "His military triumphs," says Irving, "awakened no pride nor vain-glory. . . . In the time of his greatest power he maintained the same simplicity of manners and appearance as in the days of his adversity. So far from affecting regal state, he was displeased if on entering a room any unusual testimonial of respect were shown him."

The most glaring moral defect of Mohammed's character was his passion for women, to justify which he pretended that he had received a special revelation from heaven ;‡ and, while only four lawful wives were allowed to his followers, he himself had eleven wives, besides several concubines. Mohammed's conduct in this respect, viewed in connection with his pretended revelations, would seem to go very far towards justifying those who consider him to have been simply an artful and selfish impostor. "But, however he betrayed the alloy of earth," observes Irving, "after he had worldly power at his command, the early aspirations of his spirit continually returned and bore him above all earthly things. . . . On the mercy of God he reposed all his hopes of heaven." His wife Ayeshah once asked him if it were indeed true that none could enter paradise except through God's mercy. "None—none!" he replied, with emphatic earnestness. And when she again asked if an exception would not be made in his case, he answered, with great solemnity, "Neither can I enter paradise unless God clothe me with his mercy."

Until recently, the belief has universally prevailed in Christendom that Mohammed was not merely the teacher of a false religion, but a conscious impostor, an artful, self-seeking charlatan. But such a theory of his life and character will not bear examination. Not to mention the thousand incidental proofs of his sincerity which are scattered through the history of his early life, it is wholly incredible that a mere self-seeking charlatan would have exposed himself to universal obloquy and certain persecution, in the wild hope that he might at last triumph over those religious prejudices which had been for so many ages gaining strength among his countrymen. When Aboo-Tâlib, weary of defending his nephew against the implacable hostility of the Koreishites, besought him to abandon a course attended with so much peril to himself and his kinsmen, he replied, "O uncle, I swear by God that if they put the sun on my right hand and the moon on my left, I will not renounce the career I have entered upon until God gives me success, or until I perish." Aboo-Tâlib, touched with his heroic spirit, solemnly promised that he would not give him up, whatever he might preach.

In considering the question of Mohammed's sincerity, it must not be forgotten that he possessed not only a vivid and powerful imagination, but a very peculiar physical and mental constitution. It seems not unreasonable to believe, as traditions relate, that in those nervous paroxysms to which he was subject he had visions not unlike those which his mother saw between sleeping and waking. Such visions would be almost certain to partake of the character of those earnest thoughts and convictions with which his waking soul was filled; and nothing could be more natural than for such a mind not merely to regard those visions as a divine confirmation of his peculiar views, but to employ them, modified as they would necessarily be by his powerful imagination, to give force and authority to his public teachings. Nor will it appear at all unreasonable to those conversant with human nature that one who was perfectly sincere at the beginning of his career should afterwards—under the stimulus of fear, lust, hatred, or ambition—pretend to visions which he never had, for the purpose of giving a divine sanction to his cherished opinions, or, it may be, to his arbitrary caprices or selfish desires. How often, indeed, have the professors of a far purer and higher faith resorted to stratagem and deceit to promote what they sincerely believed to be a good cause, which they had not faith enough to trust to the care of Heaven or to the legitimate operation of purely moral influences!

While we must admit, with one of the prophet's ablest and most successful defenders, (Carlyle,) that in the Moslem heaven and hell "there is enough that shocks all spiritual feeling in us," we must also admit, on a candid examination, that his religion, on the whole, made him and his followers better, and not worse. In estimating the influence of the Islâm upon the nations which embraced it, it would be obviously unjust to take as a standard of comparison the highest forms of Christian civilization. We should rather compare the condition of those nations under the sway of Mohammedanism with their condition as it was before the advent of the prophet. If the religion of Mohammed was immeasurably inferior to the religion of Christ, it was in most respects greatly superior to every form of paganism of which we have any knowledge, and probably also to much of that spurious or half-spurious Christianity which it displaced in Western Asia and Northern Africa.

"The general tenor of Mahomet's conduct," says Irving, "up to the time of his flight from Mecca, is that of an enthusiast acting under a species of mental delusion,—deeply imbued with a conviction of his being a divine agent for religious reform; and there is something striking and sublime in the luminous path which his enthusiastic spirit struck out for itself through the bewildering maze of adverse faiths and wild traditions,—the pure and spiritual worship of the one true God, which he sought to substitute for the blind idolatry of his childhood. . . . All the parts of the Koran supposed to have been promulgated by him at this time—incoherently as they have come down to us, and marred as their pristine beauty must be in passing through various hands—are of a pure and elevated character, and breathe poetical, if not religious, inspiration. They show that he had drunk deep of the living waters of Christianity; and if he had failed to imbibe them in their crystal purity, it might be because he had to drink from broken cisterns and streams troubled and perverted by those who should have been their guardians."

Died in 1666.

Molai or Molay, de, dẹh mo'lā',* (JACQUES,) last grand master of the order of the Templars, was born in Burgundy. The wealth and power to which this order had arisen having excited the jealousy of Philippe le Bel, King of France, and Pope Clement IV., a plan was laid by the two sovereigns for their destruction. Molai, being invited to France in 1306, was arrested on his arrival, together with all the Templars in that country, and, on various criminal charges, condemned to death. Nearly sixty of the knights perished at the stake; and the grand master, after seven years' imprisonment, shared their fate, in 1314.

Molbech, mol'bĕk, (CHRISTIAN,) an eminent Danish historian, philologist, and bibliographer, born at Soröe in 1783. After travelling in England and other countries of Europe, he became in 1823 professor of the history of literature, and first secretary of the Royal Library, at Copenhagen. Among his principal works are a "History of the Wars of Ditmarschen," (1813,) "Danish Dialect-Lexicon," (1837,) and "History of Erik Plogpenning," (1846.) He published between 1814 and 1817 a literary journal of great merit, entitled the "Athene," and subsequently became editor of the "Nordisk Tidskrift" and "Historisk Tidskrift," (1840.) Molbech also had a share in the great "Dictionary of the Danish Language," (unfinished.) Died at Copenhagen in 1857.

See ERSLEW, "Forfatter-Lexicon."

Molbech, (CHRISTIAN KNUD FREDERIK,) a Danish poet, a son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen in 1821. He produced "Dante," a drama, and lyric poems, (1846,) which are highly commended. D. 1888.

Molé, mo'lā', (FRANÇOIS RENÉ,) a celebrated French comedian, born in Paris in 1734. He was a member of the Institute, and director of the Academy at the Théâtre Français. Died in 1802.

Molé, (LOUIS MATHIEU,) COUNT, an eminent French statesman, born in Paris in 1781, was descended from Mathieu Molé, noticed below. He published in 1805 "Moral and Political Essays," which procured for him the favour of Napoleon, by whom he was soon after appointed master of requests, and prefect of the Côte-d'Or. In 1813 he succeeded the Duke of Massa as minister of justice. He was created a peer by Louis XVIII., and in 1817 became minister of the marine. Under Louis Philippe he was minister of foreign affairs from August to November, 1830, and became in April, 1837, prime minister; but, overcome by the opposition of Guizot, Thiers, and Berryer, he resigned his post, March 31, 1839. In 1840 he succeeded De Quelen in the French Academy. Died in 1855.

Moleschott, mo'lęs-skot', (JACOB,) a Dutch naturalist and physiologist, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1822, studied medicine and natural science at Heidelberg, and settled as a physician at Utrecht. He was the author of a "Critical Examination of Liebig's Theory of the Alimentation of Plants," (1845,) "Doctrine of Aliments," (1850,) "Circular Motion of Life," (1852,) and other similar works. He became professor of physiology and anthropology at Heidelberg in 1847, and of physiology at Zurich in 1855. Among his works are "Light and Life," ("Licht und Leben," 1856,) and one on George Forster, entitled "Georg Forster der Naturforscher des Volks," (1854.) He is ranked among the most prominent advocates of the materialistic philosophy, (although he recognizes a mixture of spiritual life with the material life of the universe.) He totally rejects the idea of creation in the ordinary signification of the term, referring the origin of all the species of animals to the operation of universal and unchangeable laws. Died May 19, 1893.

Molesworth, (Sir GUILDFORD LINDSEY,) an English engineer, was born at Millbrook in 1828. He was consulting engineer to the government of India after 1871, and wrote numerous works and papers on engineering and financial subjects.

Molesworth, mōlz'wọrth, (MARY LOUISA, née Stewart,) a Scottish author, born in 1842, on the Continent, and long a resident of Paris. Her works include several novels and many stories for children, as "Rectory Children," (1891,) "Next-Door House," (1893,) "Uncanny Tales," (1896,) "Meg Langholme," (1897,) etc.

Molesworth, mōlz'wọrth, (ROBERT,) VISCOUNT, a statesman and diplomatist, born at Dublin in 1656. He was appointed by William III. a member of his privy council, and in 1692 was envoy-extraordinary to Denmark. He published, after his return, an "Account of Denmark," a severe criticism on the government and customs of the Danes, which gave great offence to that people but was very popular in England. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and numbered among his friends Locke and Lord Shaftesbury. Died in 1725.

See WALPOLE, "Royal and Noble Authors;" LODGE, "Peerage."

Molesworth, (Sir WILLIAM,) an eminent English statesman, born in Surrey in 1810. Having completed his studies at a German university, he was elected to Parliament for East Cornwall in 1832. He was for many years associated with John Stuart Mill as editor of the "Westminster Review." He represented Southwark in Parliament in 1850, and was appointed first commissioner of public works in 1853, and secretary of the colonies in July, 1855. He died in October of the same year. Besides his articles in the "Westminster Review," Sir William published a complete edition of the works of Hobbes.

Molesworth, (WILLIAM NASSAU,) an English clergyman, born at Millbrook, in Hants, November 8, 1816. He studied at Saint John's and Pembroke Colleges, Cambridge, graduating in 1839. He then took orders, and for many years was a parish minister in Manchester and Rochdale. Among his works are "Religious Importance of Secular Instruction," (1857,) "Plain Lectures on Astronomy," "England and France," (1860,) "History of the Reform Bill," (1864,) "System of Moral Philosophy," (1867,) "History of England," (1871–73,) and "History of the Church of England," (1882.) He was distinguished as an advocate of social and political reforms. Died December 19, 1890.

Moleville, (ANTOINE FRANÇOIS BERTRAND.) See BERTRAND DE MOLLEVILLE.

Molière, mo'le-aiR', a celebrated French comic author and actor, whose original name was Jean Baptiste Poquelin, (pok'lăN',) was born in Paris on the 15th of January, 1622. He received instruction in private from the philosopher Gassendi, and in his youth assisted his father, who was a dealer in tapestry, (marchand tapissier.) He became valet-de-chambre to the king, Louis XIII., about 1640. Having assumed the name of Molière, he adopted the profession of comic actor about 1644, and a few years later appeared in the provinces at the head of a small troupe which he had formed. His first regular drama was "The Giddy-Head," ("L'Étourdi,") which was performed with success by his troupe at Lyons in 1653. Attracted to the capital by a growing ambition, and favoured with royal patronage, he opened there a theatre in 1658. His "Affected Ladies," ("Précieuses ridicules,") a satire on the affected style and euphuism which were then in fashion, was performed with great applause in 1659. "Sganarelle" came out in 1660. His fame was increased by his "School for Husbands," ("École des Maris," 1661,) a comedy of manners, character, and intrigue. He produced in 1666 "The Misanthrope," esteemed one of his master-pieces. "The dialogue of this," says Hallam, "is uniformly of the highest style; the female and indeed all the characters are excellently conceived and sustained." Still more popular was the "Hypocrite," ("Tartuffe," 1667,) an original creation in dramatic poetry, and generally considered the greatest effort of his genius. He was the author of about thirty other comedies, in verse or prose, among which "The Bores," ("Les Fâcheux," 1661,) the "School for Wives," ("École des Femmes," 1662,) "Love (or Cupid) as Physician," ("L'Amour Médecin," 1665,) "Le Médecin malgré lui," (1666,) "The Miser," ("L'Avare," 1667,) "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," (1670,) "Learned (or Pedantic) Ladies," ("Femmes savantes," 1672,) and "The Imaginary Invalid," (or "Hypochondriac," ("Le Malade imaginaire," 1672,) are greatly admired. Died in Paris, February 17, 1673.

* See Introduction, V., 7 and 9.

There is perhaps in the whole history of literature no more remarkable instance of the triumph of genius than is presented to us in the career of Molière. Seldom, if ever, were the pride and tyranny of rank more predominant than in France in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Yet many of the French nobility treated Molière as a companion and equal. "Come to me at any hour you please," said the great Prince de Condé to our author: "you have but to announce your name: your visit can never be ill-timed." (See Scott's "Miscellanies.") The success of "Tartuffe" was a signal victory achieved in the face of an all-prevailing bigotry, which was strongly entwined in the very spirit of the age and had struck deep root into the heart of the king himself. But the castle of prejudice, invincible to every other assault, was fain to open its reluctant gates to the transcendent genius of Molière. He was remarkable not merely for his wonderful comic talent, but for his admirable delineation of human nature as it appears in all countries and all ages. "In the more appropriate merits of comedy," says Hallam, "in just and forcible delineation of character, skilful contrivance of circumstances, and humorous dialogue, we must award him the prize." The same eminent critic thinks "that Shakspeare had the greater genius, but perhaps Molière has written the best comedies." He was not a member of the French Academy. After Molière's death, that learned body placed his bust in their hall, with this beautiful and appropriate inscription:

"Rien ne manque à sa gloire: il manquait à la nôtre."*

Molières, de, dẹh mo'le-aiR', (JOSEPH PRIVAT,) a French philosopher and mathematician, born at Tarascon in 1677, was a friend and disciple of Malebranche. He succeeded Varignon as professor of philosophy in the College of France in 1723, and was elected an associate of the Academy of Sciences in 1729. He was the author of several scientific works. It is related, as an instance of his abstraction of mind, that when a robber one day entered his apartment, Molières showed him where his money was kept, but begged him not to disturb his papers. Died in 1742.

Molin, mo'lăN', or Dumoulin, dü'moo'lăN', (JACQUES,) a celebrated French physician, born near Mende in 1666, was patronized by Louis XIV. and Louis XV. He made free use of the lancet in his practice, and is supposed by some to have been the original of "Dr. Sangrado" in Le Sage's "Gil Blas." On his death-bed he said to his attendants, "I leave behind me three great physicians,—Diet, Water, and Exercise." Died in 1755.

See "Eloge de M. Molin," 1761.

Molina, mo-lee'nȧ, (GIOVANNI IGNAZIO,) a naturalist, born in Chili in 1740, lived many years at Bologna. He wrote an "Essay on the Natural History of Chili," (1782,) and a "Civil History of Chili," (1787,) both in Italian. Died in 1829.

Molina, mo-lee'nȧ, (LUIS,) a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, born in New Castile about 1535, was professor of theology at Ev'ora, in Portugal, for twenty years. His principal work is entitled "De Concordia Gratiæ et Liberi Arbitrii," (1588,) in which he attempts to reconcile the free will of man with predestination. This treatise was severely assailed by the Calvinists, Dominicans, and Jansenists, and a bitter controversy ensued, which was partially suppressed by Pope Paul V. Died about 1600.

Monge, môNzh, (GASPARD,) Comte de Péluse, a celebrated French savant, and the creator of descriptive geometry, was born at Beaune in 1746. Soon after he left the College of Lyons he obtained a place in the college of military engineers at Mézières. Having by his skill in geometry made an important improvement in the process used in the art of fortification, he became, about the age of twenty, professor of mathematics and of natural philosophy at Mézières. While he filled these chairs with great credit, he gradually perfected the application of geometry to the arts of construction, which is now called descriptive geometry. In 1780 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1783 removed to Paris, where he was employed as examiner of candidates for the marine, for whose use he wrote an able "Treatise on Statics." His political affinities in the Revolution were with the republicans, who appointed him minister of the marine in 1792. He resigned in April, 1793, and distinguished himself by his zealous services in the fabrication of arms, gunpowder, and other materials, which were urgently required for the national defence. In 1795 he published the first edition of his excellent "Descriptive Geometry," and assisted in organizing the Polytechnic School, in which he taught geometry and analysis. Monge, Fourier, and Berthollet were the directors of the scientific commission which accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in 1798. Aided by pupils of the Polytechnic School, they executed the geodesic and monumental description of that country. Having returned home with Bonaparte, he presided over the arrangement and publication of the great work by which French science and art illustrated Egypt. During the Napoleonic régime he became a senator, Count of Péluse, and grand officer of the legion of honour. In 1816 he was expelled from the Institute on account of his political antecedents. He died in 1818. He left an important work called "Application of Analysis to Geometry." His discoveries in geometry form an epoch in that science, for which he is said to have done more than any one since the time of Archimedes.

Monk, mŭnk, (EDWIN GEORGE,) Mus. Doc., an English musician and composer, born at Frome, Somerset, in 1819. He has published some sacred compositions, and edited collections of hymn- and psalm-tunes.

Monk, mŭnk, (GEORGE,) Duke of Albemarle, a successful English general, born in 1608, was the son of Sir Thomas Monk, of Merton, Devonshire. After fighting in the service of Holland, he returned to England about the age of thirty. In the civil war he bore arms for Charles I., and had acquired some reputation as an able officer when he was made prisoner at Nantwich in 1644 by the Roundheads, who confined him in the Tower of London more than a year. Having accepted a commission from the Parliament, he commanded a republican army in the north of Ireland between 1646 and 1650. He contributed to the victory of Cromwell at Dunbar, in 1650, and the next year was left in Scotland as commander of an army, with which he speedily completed the reduction of that country. Hume states that he put to the sword all the inhabitants of Dundee, which he had taken by assault; though he elsewhere says his temper was humane and his moderation remarkable. In 1653 the government showed their confidence in his skill by selecting him to co-operate with Admiral Blake in a naval war against the Dutch. He commanded in the sea-fight where Van Tromp was defeated and killed. In 1654 he was successful in his efforts to enforce the will and authority of the Protector in Scotland. At the death of Oliver, in 1658, Monk proclaimed Richard Cromwell as his successor. When the officers of the army deposed Richard and restored the Long Parliament, he acquiesced, and retained command of the army in Scotland. The royalists and republicans solicited his aid in the impending crisis; but he kept all parties in suspense by his dissimulation or irresolution. About the beginning of 1660 he marched towards London, ostensibly to support the civil power against Lambert's army. "Cold-blooded and taciturn," says Macaulay, "zealous for no polity and for no religion, he maintained an impenetrable reserve" when he was implored to restore peace to the nation. Having cautiously removed from command those whom he distrusted, and prepared the way for the restoration, he declared for a free Parliament, which soon assembled, amidst general joy and exultation. Charles II. was proclaimed king in May, 1660, and rewarded the services of Monk by creating him Duke of Albemarle. In 1666 Monk maintained his reputation in a great naval battle against the Dutch. He died in 1670, leaving a son, at whose death the family became extinct. Hume, after a eulogy of his character, says, "I confess, however, that Dr. Douglas has shown me an original letter of his, containing very earnest and certainly false protestations of his zeal for a commonwealth."

Monmouth, EARL OF. See MORDAUNT, and CAREY, (HENRY.)

Monmouth, mon'mŭth, (JAMES SCOTT,) DUKE OF, born in 1649, was a natural son of Charles II. of England. His mother's name was Lucy Walters. He married about 1665 Anne Scott, Duchess of Buccleuch, said to have been the richest heiress in the kingdom, and assumed her name. He received the title of Duke of Buccleuch, and was loaded with royal favours. His personal advantages and agreeable manners rendered him very popular. "Though a libertine," says Macaulay, "he won the hearts of the Puritans." A rivalry or jealousy arose between him and the Duke of York, afterwards James II., through whose influence Monmouth was discarded from court. He was in Holland when Charles II. died, (1684.) A report that Charles II. had married Lucy Walters privately was credulously received by the populace, who regarded Monmouth as the rightful heir to the throne and the champion of the Protestant cause. With a party of armed exiles he invaded England in June, 1685, and raised the standard of rebellion. He was received with enthusiasm by the people, and gained a victory over the royal troops at Axminster; but he was completely defeated at Sedgemoor, July 6, and captured a few days later. Having been taken into the presence of King James, he threw himself at his feet, and, with abject spirit, begged for life at any price, but in vain. He was executed in July, 1685.

Monnet, mo'nà', (ANTOINE GRIMOALD,) a French chemist, born in Auvergne in 1734, was appointed inspector-general of mines. He opposed and undervalued the discoveries of Lavoisier, Berthollet, and others, and thus injured his own reputation. He published a "Treatise on the Solution of Metals," (1775,) "Historical and Political Memoir on the Mines of France," (1791,) and numerous other scientific works. Died in 1817.

Monnet, (LOUIS CLAUDE,) BARON, a French general, born in 1766. He commanded at Flushing when it was taken by the English in 1809. For this ill success he was condemned to death; but he was then a prisoner in England. Died in 1819.

Monnier, mo'ne-à', (HENRI BONAVENTURE,) a French littérateur, comedian, and caricaturist, born in Paris in 1799. He represented and caricatured the life and manners of the common people with the pen, and published several volumes of "Scènes populaires dessinées à la Plume," (1830–46.) Among his works is "Mémoires de M. Prudhomme." Died in 1877.

Monnier, (JEAN CHARLES,) COMTE, a French general, born at Cavaillon in 1758. He led a division at Marengo in June, 1800. Died in 1816.

Monnier, (LOUIS GABRIEL,) a French engraver, born at Besançon in 1733; died at Dijon in 1804.

Monnier, de, dẹh mo'ne-à', (MARIE THÉRÈSE Richard de Ruffey—re'shȧr' dẹh rü'fȧ',) MARQUISE, a French lady, known under the name of SOPHIE, and celebrated in consequence of her connection with Mirabeau, was born at Pontarlier in 1754. Died in 1789. (See MIRABEAU.)

Monnier, Le. See LEMONNIER.

Monnier, Le, lẹh mo'ne-à', (PIERRE,) a French savant, born in Normandy about 1675, published a work entitled "Course of Philosophy." He was a member of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1757.

Monnoie or Monnoye, de la, dẹh lȧ mo'nwȧ', (BERNARD,) a French poet and critic, born at Dijon in 1641. He was the author of a poem entitled "The Duel Abolished," which obtained the first prize ever awarded by the French Academy. He was elected a member of that institution in 1713. He also published poems in Latin and French, and several critical treatises. Died in 1728.

See R. DE JUVIGNY, "Mémoire historique sur la Vie, etc. de La Monnoye."

Monnoyer, mo'nwȧ'yà', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated painter of flowers and fruit, born at Lille, in Flanders, in 1635. Having visited Paris, he was employed in the decoration of Versailles and the Trianon. He afterwards repaired to England, where he executed some of his best works. Among his master-pieces are the flower-border of a mirror at Kensington, and the decorations of Montagu House. His flower-pieces have never been surpassed for brilliancy of colouring and free and graceful grouping. He died in 1699, leaving a son, ANTOINE, who was also a flower-painter.

See R. DUMESNIL, "Le Peintre-Graveur Français."

Monod, mo'nod', (ADOLPHE,) an eminent Swiss Protestant minister, born about 1800. He lectured on theology and Hebrew at the College of Montauban from 1836 to 1852, and became minister of the Reformed Church of Paris in 1853. He acquired a wide reputation as a preacher and moralist, and wrote numerous religious treatises. He belonged to the most orthodox school of French Protestants. Died in 1856.

Monod, (FRÉDÉRIC,) a Swiss Protestant minister, born at Monnaz, in the Canton de Vaud, in 1794, was a brother of the preceding. He became in 1832 pastor of the Protestant sect called "Évangélistes libres," in Paris. He edited for many years "The Archives of Christianity," and published a number of sermons. Died in 1863.

Monod, (JEAN,) a Swiss Protestant divine, born at Geneva in 1765, was the father of the preceding. He was pastor of a church in Paris, and in 1830 became president of the Consistory of the Reformed Church. He contributed to the "Biographie Universelle" many notices of eminent Swiss writers, etc. Died in 1836.

Monpou, môn'poo', (HIPPOLYTE,) a French composer and singer, born in Paris in 1804. He composed popular ballads and operas, among which is "Les deux Reines," (1835.) Died in 1841.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Monrad, mon'rȧd, (DITLEV GOTHARD,) a Danish bishop, born at Copenhagen, November 24, 1811. In 1849 he was made Bishop of Laaland. He was at various times minister of worship, of the interior, and of finance. He was president of the Legislative Chamber during the war which in 1864 detached Sleswick and Holstein from Denmark. He lived in New Zealand from 1864 to 1869. He returned to his diocese in 1871. Died in 1887.

Mon-rō′, (ALEXANDER, distinguished as Primus, i.e. the "first,") an eminent physician and anatomist, born in London in 1697. He studied successively in London, Paris, and at Leyden under Boerhaave, and was appointed, after his return, demonstrator of anatomy to the Surgeons' Company at Edinburgh. The lectures he delivered at this time won for him a high reputation, and were chiefly instrumental in founding the Medical School of Edinburgh. Under his direction also was established the Royal Infirmary of that city, in which he gave clinical lectures on surgery. He published in 1726 his "Osteology, or Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones," which passed through numerous editions and was translated into French and German. Among his other works are an "Essay on Comparative Anatomy," (1744,) and "Account of the Inoculation of Small-Pox in Scotland," (1765.) Dr. Monro was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and a member of the Academy of Surgery in Paris. Died in 1767.

Monro, (ALEXANDER Secundus, or the "second,") son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in 1732. He succeeded his father in the chair of anatomy and surgery in the University of Edinburgh in 1759. He died in 1817, leaving a number of medical treatises of great merit. Among these we may name "Observations on the Structure, etc. of the Nervous System," (1783,) and "Structure and Physiology of Fishes," (1785.)

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Monro, (ALEXANDER Tertius, or the "third,") a physician, a son of the preceding, was born in Edinburgh about 1774. He was professor of anatomy at Edinburgh, and published several works on anatomy and medicine. Died in 1859.

Monro, (DONALD,) brother of Alexander, (1732–1817,) was born at Edinburgh in 1729. He was appointed chief physician to the army, which he accompanied to Germany in 1761. He published, among other works, a treatise "On the Means of Preserving the Health of Soldiers." Died in 1802.

Monroe, (HARRIET,) an American poet, born at Chicago in 1860. She was the author of the "Columbian Ode," sung at the opening of the World's Columbian Exposition in 1893, and published "Valeria and Other Poems," etc.

Monroe, mŭn-rō′, (JAMES,) an American statesman, and the fifth President of the United States, was born in Westmoreland county, Virginia, April 28, 1758. He was a son of Spence Monroe, a planter, was educated at William and Mary College, and entered the army as a cadet in 1776. He soon became a lieutenant in the army of Washington, and served at the battles of Harlem Heights and White Plains. He was wounded in the battle of Trenton, December, 1776, and for his conduct there was promoted to the rank of captain. As aide-de-camp to Lord Stirling, he served with distinction at the battle of Brandywine, September, 1777, and at that of Monmouth, June, 1778. Having lost his rank in the regular army by becoming an aide to Lord Stirling, he retired from the service in 1778, and studied law under Thomas Jefferson. He was elected a member of the Assembly of Virginia in 1782, and a delegate to the General Congress in 1783 for three years. He married, about 1785, a Miss Kortright, of New York.

As a member of the Convention of Virginia, in 1788, he opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, which, in his opinion, gave too much power to the Federal government. He accordingly united himself with the Anti-Federalists, or Republican party, and was elected a Senator of the United States for four years by the legislature of Virginia in 1790. In 1794 he was sent to France as minister-plenipotentiary. He offended the heads of the home government by the open expression of sympathy with the French republicans, or by a departure from a neutral policy, and was recalled about the end of 1796. He was Governor of Virginia three years, (1799–1802.) In 1802 he was sent to France as envoy-extraordinary, to unite with Edward Livingston, then the resident minister at Paris, in a negotiation for the purchase of Louisiana,—i.e. the whole valley of the Mississippi. They purchased that vast territory from Bonaparte for $15,000,000. In 1803 Mr. Monroe was sent as minister-plenipotentiary to England, and in 1805 performed a diplomatic mission to Spain in relation to the boundary of Louisiana. He returned to London in 1806, and, aided by Mr. Pinckney, negotiated a treaty for the protection of maritime interests and neutral rights; but the government of the United States refused to ratify this treaty, because it did not provide against the impressment of seamen. He returned home in 1808, and passed about two years in a private station.

In 1811 he was elected Governor of Virginia. He was appointed secretary of state by President Madison in November, 1811. He acted as secretary of war during the disastrous and gloomy period that followed the capture of Washington, September, 1814–March, 1815, and rendered important services by his energetic measures to restore the public credit and reinforce the army. He did not cease to be secretary of state until March, 1817. He was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1816, and was elected by a large majority, receiving one hundred and eighty-three electoral votes. His competitor was Rufus King, who received thirty-four votes. He appointed John Q. Adams secretary of state, William H. Crawford secretary of the treasury, John C. Calhoun secretary of war, and Smith Thompson secretary of the navy. The violence of party spirit abated during his administration, which encountered no strong opposition. In 1819 Spain ceded Florida to the United States. He was re-elected President in 1820 without opposition, receiving every electoral vote except one. During his second term the independence of the South American colonies of Spain was recognized by the United States. In his message of December, 1823, he asserted the important principle of foreign policy which forms the celebrated "Monroe Doctrine," in these terms: "We owe it, therefore, to candour and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, [i.e. the European powers,] to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." He retired from office in March, 1825, after which he resided at Oak Hill, Loudon county, Virginia. He was elected president of the convention which met in 1829 to revise the Constitution of Virginia. A speech which he made in that Convention contains this incidental remark on slavery:—"No imputation can be cast on Virginia in this matter. She did all that was in her power to do, to prevent the extension of slavery and to mitigate its evils so far as she could."* He died in the city of New York, at the residence of his son-in-law, Samuel L. Gouverneur, on the 4th of July, 1831, leaving the reputation of a discreet and successful statesman, more distinguished for administrative talents than for oratorical powers.

Monrose, môn′roz′, the assumed name of CLAUDE LOUIS BARRIZAIN, (bȧ′re′zȧN′,) a French comic actor, born at Besançon in 1783; died in 1843.

Mons, van, vȧn mŏns or mŏNss, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) an eminent Belgian chemist and pomologist, was born at Brussels in 1765. Having learned the art of pharmacy, he was chosen in 1797 professor of chemistry, etc. in Brussels. He founded the "Journal de Chimie et Physique," which for many years was a central dépôt of the progress of science in Europe. Having a ruling passion for the culture of fruit, he began at an early age to theorize and experiment on the production of new varieties. About the age of twenty he adopted the theory that seedlings of new varieties have more tendency to improve than those of old varieties, or, in other words while good old varieties mostly produce inferior sorts, those which are recent and bad tend to change for the better. Having planted a large nursery and devoted his life chiefly to experiments on the pear, he was successful in producing many fine varieties, among which was the Beurré Diel. Soon after 1815 he was appointed professor of chemistry at Louvain. He published "Principles of Electricity," (1802,) "Principles of Philosophic Chemistry," (1818,) "Fruit-Trees and their Culture," (1835,) and other works. He was an associate of the Institute of France. Died in 1842. "The constant springing up of fine new sorts of fruit in the United States," says Downing, "is given with much apparent force as a proof of the accuracy of the Van Mons theory."

Mons, van, (THÉODORE,) a jurist, a son of the preceding, was born at Brussels in 1801. He published several legal works.

Mon'sell, (JOHN SAMUEL BEWLEY,) D.D., LL.D., a poet and clergyman, born at Londonderry, Ireland, March 2, 1811. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1832, and became a presbyter of the Church of England. Died at Guildford, Surrey, April 9, 1875. He published various works, but is chiefly known for his hymns.

Monselet, môn'seh-lā', (CHARLES,) a French littérateur, born at Nantes in 1825. He wrote, besides various other works, "Statues et Statuettes," (1851,) and "Figurines Parisiennes," (1854.) Died May 19, 1888.

Mon'sell, (WILLIAM,) M.P., was born in Limerick county, Ireland, in 1812. He was appointed a privy councillor in 1855, president of the board of health in 1857, was vice-president of the board of trade a few months in 1866, and became under-secretary for the colonies in 1868. He was postmaster-general, (1871–73,) and received the title of Baron Emly. Died in 1894.

Monsiau, môn'se-ō', (NICOLAS ANDRÉ,) a French historical painter, born in Paris in 1754, worked with remarkable facility. Died in 1837.

Monsignori, mon-sēn-yo'ree, (FRANCESCO,) sometimes called BONSIGNORI, a skilful Italian painter, born at Verona in 1455. He was a pupil of Andrea Mantegna, and worked mostly at Mantua. Died in 1519.

Monsigny, môn'sēn'ye', (PIERRE ALEXANDRE,) a French composer, born at Artois in 1729. He produced, besides other operas, "Le Maître en Droit," and "Le Cadi dupé," (1760,) the comic operas of "The King and the Farmer" and "Rose and Colas," and was elected a member of the Institute, (1813.) Died in 1817.

Mon'son, (Sir EDMUND JOHN,) an English diplomatist, born at Chart Lodge, Kent, in 1834. He entered the public service in 1856, was attaché and secretary to many foreign legations, and minister at several South American courts 1879–84. He was made minister to Denmark in 1884, to Greece 1888, to Belgium 1892, ambassador to Austria 1893, and to France 1898.

Mon'son, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English naval commander, born in Lincolnshire about 1569, served with distinction against the Spaniards, Dutch, and French, and attained the rank of vice-admiral. He was the author of "Naval Tracts," which were published in Churchill's "Collection of Voyages." Died in 1643.

Monstrelet, de, deh môn'streh-lā', (ENGUERRAND,) a French chronicler, born about 1390, wrote an account of the wars of his time between the factions of Armagnac and Burgundy. His "Chronicles," beginning in 1400 and brought down to 1444, fill the space between the histories of Froissart and Comines, and are highly esteemed for their accuracy and the perspicuity and simplicity of their style. Died in 1453.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Montagna, mon-tän'yä, (BARTOLOMMEO,) an Italian painter, born at Vicenza, lived about 1460–1500, and studied under Andrea Mantegna. Among his masterpieces we may name the "Madonna on a Throne with Saint Andrew and other Saints," at the Museum of Milan.

Montagna, (BENEDETTO,) an Italian engraver, a relative of the preceding, was born at Vicenza about 1458; died in 1530.

Montagne, môn'tăñ', (JEAN FRANÇOIS CAMILLE,) a French botanist, born at Vaudoy in 1784. Having studied medicine, he was appointed in 1815 surgeon-in-chief of the army of Murat. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1852, and in 1858 was made an officer of the legion of honour. He contributed to the "Archives de Botanique" and to other scientific journals a number of valuable treatises on the Cryptogamia, among which we may name "Notice of the Cryptogamous Plants recently discovered in France." Died in 1866.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Montagny, môn'tăn'ye', (ÉTIENNE,) a French sculptor, born at Saint-Étienne in 1816. He obtained a medal of the first class for a statue of Saint Louis, in 1859.

Mŏn'tą-gū, (BASIL,) an eminent English lawyer and writer, born in London in 1770, was a natural son of John Montagu, Earl of Sandwich. Having graduated at Cambridge, he was called to the bar in 1798. He practised with ability and success, and extended his reputation by numerous legal publications, the most important of which is a "Digest of the Bankrupt Laws, with a Collection of the Statutes and of the Cases determined upon that Subject," (1805.) He was associated with Romilly and Wilberforce in successful effort to abolish hanging for forgery and for certain other crimes. In 1825 he produced a valuable edition of Lord Bacon's works, on which he expended the labour of many years; also a "Life of Bacon," in reference to which Macaulay says, "About his merit as a collector of materials there can be no dispute; and we are indebted to his minute and accurate researches for the means of refuting what we cannot but consider his errors." He published "Essays and Selections," and various other works. Died in 1851.

Montagu, (EDWARD WORTLEY,) son of Lady Mary Montagu, noticed below, was born in Yorkshire in 1713. At an early age he manifested a propensity to low vices, and great eccentricity of character. When placed at school he repeatedly ran away, and at length hired himself as a cabin-boy in a ship bound for Spain. Being discovered and sent back to his family, he travelled soon after on the continent. After his return he was member of two successive Parliaments. He next went to Italy, where he was converted to Catholicism, and not long after visited Egypt, and there professed Mohammedanism. He was the author of "Reflections on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics." Died in 1776.

Montagu, (HENRY.) See MANCHESTER, EARL OF.

Montagu, (Lady MARY WORTLEY,) a celebrated English writer, born in Nottinghamshire about 1690. She was the daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, Duke of Kingston, and Lady Mary Fielding, and cousin to the novelist Henry Fielding. She was early distinguished for the brilliancy of her intellect and her rapid acquisition of knowledge. In 1712 she was married to Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq., and a few years after, on his appointment to a place in the treasury, accompanied him to London. Here she attracted general admiration by her wit and remarkable beauty, and became intimate with Addison, Pope, and other celebrated writers of the time. In 1716 she accompanied her husband, on his being appointed ambassador, to Constantinople. During her residence of two years at the Porte, she wrote to her friends in England a series of Letters containing shrewd and lively descriptions of Oriental life and manners. On her return to England she became the means of introducing the Turkish practice of inoculation, having had the courage to have the experiment first tried on her own son. The next remarkable event in Lady Mary's life is her quarrel with Pope, the cause of which is not with certainty known. In 1739 she left England for Italy, where she resided upwards of twenty years. She returned in 1761, and died the following year. Besides the son mentioned above, she left a daughter Mary, who was married to the Earl of Bute, minister of George III.

Lady Mary wrote a number of poems, of which the "Town Eclogues" only are entitled to much notice. Her literary reputation is owing chiefly to her "Letters," which are ranked among the finest specimens of epistolary composition.

Montagu, (Lord ROBERT,) an English economist, was born in 1825, son of the Duke of Manchester. He was a member of Parliament 1859–80, and the author of numerous works on economical, political, and other subjects.

Montague, mŏn'ta-gū, (Sir EDWARD,) an English statesman, born in Northamptonshire. He was appointed chief justice of the court of king's bench in 1539, and chief justice of the common pleas in 1546. He was one of the counsellors designated in the will of Henry VIII. to administer the government during the minority of Edward VI. Died in 1556.

Montague, (EDWARD,) Earl of Sandwich, an English naval commander, born in 1625. He served for a time on the side of the Parliament, but subsequently went over to the royalists, and assisted General Monk in the restoration of Charles II. For this service he was successively created an earl, a knight of the Garter, member of the privy council, and admiral of the Narrow Seas. On the renewal of the war with Holland, in 1672, Lord Sandwich commanded the squadron under the Duke of York against De Ruyter, and perished in the burning of the Royal James.

Montague, (ELIZABETH,) a celebrated English lady, born in Yorkshire in 1720. Her early studies were directed by Dr. Conyers Middleton, who was connected with her family. In 1742 she was married to Edward Montague, Esq. After the death of her husband, in 1775, she resided in Portman Square, London, where she numbered among her visitors the most eminent men of the day, including Burke, Johnson, Goldsmith, and Reynolds. She was also intimate with Mrs. Elizabeth Carter and Hannah More. Mrs. Montague contributed several "Dialogues of the Dead" to those published by Lord Lyttelton; but her principal work is an "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare," which obtained for her a high reputation. In this production she has ably refuted the false charges of Voltaire against the great English poet. She is said to have been the founder of the literary society called the "Blue-Stocking Club." Her correspondence was published after her death. Died in 1800.

Montague, (GEORGE,) an English naturalist, born in Wiltshire. In 1802 he published an "Ornithological Dictionary, or Synopsis of British Birds," and soon after his "Testacea Britannica," or "Natural History of British Shells," illustrated. Both of these works are highly esteemed. Montague was a member of the Linnæan Society of London. Died in 1815.

Montague, (JOHN,) Earl of Sandwich, an English statesman, born in London in 1718. He was first lord of the admiralty in 1749 and 1750, and obtained the same office in 1763. He supported the administration of Lord North, under whom he served as first lord of the admiralty from 1771 to 1782. He was more deficient in principle than in capacity. Died in 1792.

Mon'ta-gue, (WILLIAM LEWIS,) an American educator, born at Belchertown, Massachusetts, April 6, 1831. He graduated at Amherst College in 1855, and after 1862 held the professorship of modern languages in that institution. His publications include Spanish and Italian grammars, "Introduction to Italian Literature," and other works.

Montaigne, mŏn-tān', de, [Fr. pron. deh mŏN'tȧ̈N',] (MICHEL Eyquem—ā'kŏN',) a celebrated French philosopher and essayist, born at the château de Montaigne, in Périgord, on the 28th of February, 1533. His father, who was one of the noblesse, placed him, while very young, under the tuition of masters who were ignorant of French, and who conversed with him only in Latin, which thus became his natural language. At the age of thirteen he had finished his studies at a college of Bordeaux. Having studied law, he became a judge at Bordeaux about 1554. In 1565 or 1566 he married, par convenance, Françoise de la Chassaigne. In 1580 he produced his celebrated "Essays," which have enjoyed an almost unparalleled popularity. Soon after that date he made a tour in Germany, Italy, etc., of which he wrote a Journal. He often visited Paris, in order to perform his duties as gentleman of the king's chamber. From 1581 to 1585 he was mayor of Bordeaux. During the civil war of the League his impartial moderation did not exempt him from danger and persecution. He died in September, 1592. "The Essays of Montaigne," says Hallam, "make in several respects an epoch in literature, less on account of their real importance than of their influence on the taste and opinions of Europe. . . . No prose writer of the sixteenth century has been so generally read, nor, probably, given so much delight. Whatever may be our estimate of Montaigne as a philosopher,—a name which he was far from arrogating,—there will be but one opinion of the felicity and brightness of his genius." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") "The author of these 'Essais,'" says Leo Joubert, "is certainly the most independent spirit that ever existed,—independent without revolt, and detached from the systems of others without having any system of his own. . . . We recognize in his 'Essays' a nature well endowed, not heroic, perhaps, but generous, exquisitely sensible, not aspiring to the sublime, capable of devotion, and incapable of a base act,—in fine, a model of what we may call average virtue," (la vertu moyenne.) ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") Sprightly humour, independence, naïveté, and originality are the characteristics of his mind; and his style is admired for its graceful simplicity. His works are highly seasoned with his own individuality, and afford much insight into his character.

"The Essays," says Emerson, "are an entertaining soliloquy on every random topic that comes into his head,—treating everything without ceremony, yet with masculine sense. There have been men with deeper insight, but, one would say, never a man with such abundance of thoughts: he is never dull, never insincere, and has the genius to make the reader care for all that he cares for. . . . This book of Montaigne the world has endorsed by translating it into all tongues and printing seventy-five editions of it in Europe,—and that, too, a circulation somewhat chosen, namely, among courtiers, soldiers, princes, men of the world, and men of wit and generosity." Montalembert, de, deh mŏN'tȧ'lŏN'bair', (CHARLES FORBES,) COMTE, a distinguished statesman, orator, and political writer, of French extraction, born in London in 1810, was a son of Marc René Anne Marie, noticed below. His mother was Miss Forbes, a Scottish lady.

He studied in Paris, and in 1830 became associated with Lamennais and Lacordaire as editor of "L'Avenir," in which post he was conspicuous as an eloquent champion of democracy and the Catholic Church. He entered the Chamber of Peers in 1831, and married, in 1843, Mademoiselle de Mérode, a Belgian lady. Devoted to the Liberal Catholic party, of which he was regarded as the most eminent leader, he was an earnest advocate of religious toleration, popular rights, and general education. He was a member of the Constituent Assembly in 1848, and in 1849 was elected to the Legislative Assembly, in which he opposed Victor Hugo in several brilliant efforts of oratory, especially during the debate on the revision of the constitution, in June, 1851. He was elected to the French Academy in 1852, and was a member of the legislative body from 1852 to 1857, during which period he represented the opposition almost alone. In 1858 he was condemned to a fine, and imprisonment for six months, for a political essay entitled "A Debate on India in the English Parliament;" but the penalties were not actually inflicted. He published, among other works, a "History of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary," (1836,) "On Vandalism and Catholicism in Art," (1839,) "The Political Future of England," (1855,) "The Monks of the West, from Saint Benedict to Saint Bernard," (1860,) and "The Free Church in the Free State," ("L'Église libre dans l'État libre," 1863.) He sympathized with the Unionists in the American civil war. In a letter to an English friend, dated December, 1869, he wrote, "Temporal despotism has faded away in a most unexpected manner; and I sincerely hope spiritual despotism will follow, sooner or later. . . . I am more convinced than ever that freedom in the sphere of religion, still more than in that of politics, is the vital condition of truth." A great sensation was produced by his letter dated February 28, 1870, in which he protested—almost with his latest breath—against the dogma of papal infallibility, and those ultramontanes "who have immolated justice and truth, reason and history, in one great holocaust to the idol they have raised up for themselves at the Vatican." Died in March, 1870.

Montecuccoli, mon-tȧ-kook'ko-lee, written also Montecucculi, (RAIMONDO,) COUNT, one of the greatest military commanders of his time, was born at Modena, in Italy, in 1608. Having entered the Austrian service, he distinguished himself in the campaign of 1637 against the Swedes; but he was subsequently defeated by the Swedish general Bannér, (1639,) and made prisoner. He was released after two years' captivity, and in 1664 gained a signal victory over the Turks at Saint Gothard, for which he was made lieutenant-general. He was sent in 1673 to oppose the celebrated Turenne; but, although consummate skill was displayed by both generals in their manœuvres, no decisive battle was fought. Montecucculi regarded this his last campaign as the most glorious of all, since he had encountered Turenne and Condé without being defeated. He died in 1681, leaving a "Treatise on the Art of War," which is highly esteemed. He was a liberal patron of learning, and was one of the founders of the Academy of Naturalists at Vienna. He had been created by the King of Spain a knight of the golden fleece, and obtained from him the principality of Amalfi.

Montesquieu, mon'tẽs'ke-ụh', Baron, a grandson of the following, was born in 1755. He served as an officer, with distinction, in the United States, (1779–81.) In 1792 he became a royalist émigré. He passed many years in England, where he died about 1824.

Montesquieu, mòn'tẹs-kū', de, [Fr. pron. dẹh mòn'-tẽs'ke-ụh',] or, more fully, De la Brède et (dẹh lă brăd à) de Montesquieu, (Charles de Secondat—dẹh seh-kòn'dă',) Baron, a brilliant, original, and popular French author, was born of a noble family near Bordeaux on the 18th of January, 1689. In his childhood he formed habits of intense application to study, and became an insatiable reader. He has declared that he never felt a sorrow which an hour's reading would not dissipate or relieve. Having been educated for the law, he became a conseiller, or judge, in the parliament of Bordeaux in 1714, and président à mortier of the same in 1716. The favourite studies of his mature powers were historical and moral sciences.

In 1721 he acquired a rather sudden celebrity by his "Persian Letters," a work which combines the attractions of romance with the resources of rational philosophy, and presents profound and luminous views of commerce, law, and social phenomena. Its prodigious success was due partly to its spirited, keen, and witty satire on French manners, and its brilliant, piquant style, full of happy reticences and unexpected contrasts. In 1726 he sold his office of president, and in 1728 was admitted into the French Academy. He then began a journey, in which he visited nearly all the countries of Europe. He passed two years in England, and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1734 he produced an admired work, "Considerations on the Causes of the Grandeur and Decadence of the Romans," the most complete essay that had appeared on that subject. He afterwards devoted fourteen years to the composition of his greatest work, "The Spirit of Laws," ("L'Esprit des Lois," 1748,) which excited almost universal admiration. In eighteen months it ran through twenty-two editions. In this arduous enterprise of exploring the labyrinths of history and political science he was in advance of his age as an advocate of liberty and humanity. In reference to this work, Voltaire said, "The human race had lost its titles; Montesquieu found and restored them." He died in Paris in February, 1755. He had married Mademoiselle de Lartigues in 1715. His personal character was in a high degree amiable and estimable.

Mon-te-zu'mạ I., called also Moctheuzoma, Aztec emperor of Mexico, ascended the throne about 1437. Before this event he had been an eminent general. He extended the boundaries of his dominions by the conquest of several adjacent nations. He was a powerful and despotic monarch, and multiplied human sacrifices. Died about 1470.

Montezuma II., the last Aztec emperor of Mexico, was born about 1470. He was elected sovereign in 1502 for his superior merit as a warrior and a priest. When his election was announced to him, he was in the act of sweeping the stairs of the great temple Teocalli. In the former part of his reign he waged war with success against several peoples, and extended the limits of the empire. He offended his subjects by his haughty deportment, and oppressed them by the imposition of grievous taxes which were required to support his sumptuous style of living. In 1519 his empire was invaded by Cortez, against whom he employed a temporizing policy. He sent him a magnificent present, but forbade him to approach the capital. "This was to reveal," says Prescott, "both his wealth and his weakness." Cortez entered the city of Mexico, without resistance, in November, 1519, and found a hospitable reception. To secure himself against contingencies, the audacious Spaniard next seized Montezuma and held him as a hostage. His captors tried to convert him to the Roman Catholic religion, but without success. In compliance with the demand of Cortez, he formally recognized the supremacy of the emperor Charles V., to whom he sent an immense quantity of gold as tribute. In May, 1520, Cortez absented himself from the capital to fight his rival Narvaez, and during his absence the Mexicans revolted against the Spaniards. Montezuma was persuaded or compelled by Cortez to address his subjects and try to appease the tumult. He was assailed with missiles by the insurgents, was wounded, and died in June, 1520. "Stately and decorous," says Prescott, "he was careful of his own dignity, and might be said to be as great an 'actor of majesty' among the barbarian potentates of the New World as Louis XIV. was among the polished princes of Europe. . . . Montezuma's amiable and inoffensive manners, together with his liberality,—the most popular of virtues with the vulgar,—made him generally beloved by the Spaniards."

Montfaucon, de, dẹh môn'fō'kôn', [Lat. MONTEFALCO'NIUS,] (BERNARD,) an eminent French antiquary and philologist, born in Languedoc in 1655, was a member of the congregation of Benedictines of Saint-Maur. Having visited Italy in 1698, he published, after his return, his "Diarium Italicum," an account of the libraries of Italy, "Palæographia Græca," a treatise on the origin and progress of Greek letters, "Antiquity Explained and Represented in Figures," (10 vols. fol., 1719, in French and Latin,) and "The Monuments of the French Monarchy," (5 vols., 1729.) He also published excellent editions of Saint Chrysostom and other Greek writers. He was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. Died in 1741.

He became King of Thessalonica in 1183, and was chosen the chief of the fifth or fourth crusade in 1202. He was an able commander, and contributed greatly to the conquest of Constantinople in 1204. Died in 1207.

Montferrat, de, (GUILLAUME,) MARQUIS, called THE GREAT, was born in 1243, and began to reign in 1254. He was a turbulent prince and continually engaged in war with the neighbouring states. He married Beatrix, a daughter of Alfonso X. of Castile, in 1271. Having been taken prisoner in 1290, he was confined in an iron cage, and died in 1292.

Montferrier, de, dẹh môn'fą're-ą', (ALEXANDRE ANDRÉ VICTOR SARRAZIN,) a French mathematician, born in Paris in 1792. He published, besides other works, a "Dictionary of Mathematical Sciences, Pure and Applied," (3 vols., 1834–40.) Died March 13, 1863.

Montfleury, môn'fluh're', the literary name of ANTOINE Jacob, a French actor and dramatist, born in 1640. He was an active rival of Molière, and left sixteen rather coarse, but very effective, comedies.

Montfleury, de, dẹh môn'fluh're', (JEAN LE PETIT,) a French poet, born at Caen in 1698; died in 1777.

Montfort, COUNT DE. See JOHN, Duke of Brittany.

Montfort, môn'fȯr, de, [Fr. pron. dẹh môn'fȯr',] (SIMON,) COUNT, a French nobleman and military commander, born about 1150, was conspicuous for his courage and for his cruelty in the wars against the Albigenses, (1208.) He was killed while besieging Toulouse, in 1218.

Montfort, de, (SIMON,) a son of the preceding, obtained at an early age the patronage of Henry III. of England, who made him Earl of Leicester and gave to him in marriage his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. He was afterwards appointed lieutenant-general in Gascony. In 1258, a rupture having occurred between Henry and his barons, the latter, headed by Montfort, compelled the king to consent to the regulations called the Provisions of Oxford, which threw the legislative and executive power into the hands of twenty-four barons. In 1264 a battle took place at Lewes, in Sussex, in which the royalists were defeated and the king taken prisoner. Montfort summoned a Parliament in 1265, in which, in addition to the two knights returned from every shire, representatives were sent from the boroughs; and in this way was founded the English House of Commons. In the battle of Evesham, the same year, Montfort was defeated and slain by the royal troops under Prince Edward.

Montgaillard, môn'gą'yąr', (GUILLAUME HONORÉ ROQUES,) a historian, born near Toulouse in 1772. He wrote a "Chronological Review of the History of France, etc., 1787–1818," (1820,) which was once popular. Died in 1825.

Montgaillard, (JEAN GABRIEL MAURICE ROQUES,) a French adventurer and political writer, a brother of the preceding, was born at Toulouse in 1761. He was employed as a secret agent by the Bourbons and by their enemies. He published a "Memoir concerning the Treason of Pichegru," etc., and several other works. Died in 1841.

Montgelas, môn'zhẹh-lą', (MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH,) COUNT, a German statesman, of Savoyard extraction, born at Munich in 1759, was appointed minister of foreign affairs in 1799, minister of the interior in 1806, and minister of finance in 1809. Died in 1838.

Montglat, de, dẹh môn'glą', MARQUIS, a French author, of whom little is known. He left memoirs of the Thirty Years' War and of the campaigns before the Treaty of the Pyrenees. These memoirs are of much historical value.

Montgolfier, mŏnt-gōl'fe-ẹr, [Fr. pron. môn'gol'fe-ą',] (JACQUES ÉTIENNE,) an ingenious Frenchman, who invented the air-balloon, was born at or near Annonay (Ardèche) in 1745. After studying mathematics with success at Paris, he became an architect. At the request of his father, he quitted that profession in order to take charge of the paper-manufactory at Annonay. He invented new machines and more simple processes in this art. On reading Priestley's treatise "On Different Kinds of Air," he conceived the possibility of aerial navigation, and imparted the idea to his brother Joseph, who was as another self. Acting in concert and community, they contrived the means of realizing this project. After trying hydrogen gas and other fluids, they made the first public experiment at Annonay in June, 1783, and sent up a balloon about thirty-seven French feet in diameter, inflated with air rarefied by heat. This successful experiment made a great sensation, and was soon repeated at Paris. The brothers were admitted into the Academy of Sciences. Their balloons were called Montgolfières. The first who successfully used hydrogen gas in balloons was M. Charles. Montgolfier died in 1799. (See CHARLES, JACQUES ALEXANDRE.)

Montgolfier, (JOSEPH MICHEL,) an ingenious French mechanician, born at Annonay in 1740, was one of the inventors of the air-balloon. In his youth he assisted his father, who was a successful manufacturer of paper. In partnership with a brother, he carried on the same business at Voiron and Beaujeu. He had made several improvements in the fabrication of paper before his aerostatic experiments blazoned his name throughout Europe. (See the preceding article.) About 1792 he made a valuable improvement in the hydraulic ram. He also invented a hydraulic press and other mechanical instruments. He was a member of the Institute of France. Died in 1810.

Montgomerie, (ARCHIBALD WILLIAM.) See EGLINTON.

Montgomery, mŏnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, (ALEXANDER,) a Scottish poet under the reign of James VI., was the author of an allegorical piece entitled "The Cherry and the Slae." Died about 1610.

Montgomery, (FLORENCE SOPHIA,) a novelist, born in Donegal, Ireland, in 1847. Among her books are "A Very Simple Story," (1867,) "The Blue Veil," (1883,) "Colonel Norton," (1805,) etc.

Montgomery, mŏnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, (GEORGE WASHINGTON,) a native of Spain, settled in America, where he published "Bernardo del Carpio," a historical romance, and translated into Spanish Irving's "Conquest of Granada." Died in 1841.

Montgomery, (Sir JAMES,) a Scottish politician, and a chief of the Covenanters. He was appointed lord justice clerk in 1689. "In parliamentary ability and eloquence," says Macaulay, "he had no superior among his countrymen except Sir John Dalrymple." He was turbulent and perfidious. In 1690 he joined the Jacobites in plotting against William III.

See MACAULAY, "History of England," vol. iii.

Montgomery, (JAMES,) a distinguished poet, born in Ayrshire, Scotland, in 1771, was the son of a Moravian preacher. He was sent at an early age to the Moravian school at Fulneck, in Yorkshire, where his progress was not very satisfactory to his teachers, as he spent the greater part of his time in reading and writing poetry, which was prohibited by the rules of the school. After leaving Fulneck, he resided for a time, as shopman in a book-store, in London, and in 1792 began to contribute political articles to the "Sheffield Register," edited by Mr. Joseph Gales. He founded in 1794 a reform journal, called the "Sheffield Iris," of which he was editor about thirty years. Several of his articles having been denounced as revolutionary, he was twice fined and imprisoned. He published in 1806 his "Wanderer of Switzerland," which was followed by "The West Indies," (1809,) "The World before the Flood," (1812,) and "The Pelican Island," (1827.) These poems are distinguished for depth and tenderness of feeling, elevated moral sentiment, and graceful description. He also wrote a number of hymns of great beauty, which enjoy extensive popularity. One of Mr. Montgomery's last works was a "History of Missionary Enterprise in the South Seas," (1830.) Died in 1854.

Montgomery, mŏnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, (ROBERT,) an English divine and poet, born at Bath in 1807. He was the author of a poem entitled "The Omnipresence of the Deity," (1828,) which had great temporary success, eight editions being sold in as many months. He became in 1843 pastor of Percy Street Chapel, London. The extraordinary success of his poetry was chiefly to be ascribed to the nature of his subject and the favour of a large portion of the religious community. Died in 1855.

See MACAULAY, in the "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1830; "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iv. chap. xvii.;

Montgomery, (WILLIAM R.,) an American officer, born in New Jersey, July 10, 1801, served in the Mexican war, became brigadier-general of volunteers in the Union army in 1861, and military commandant of Philadelphia in 1862. Died at Bristol, Pennsylvania, May 31, 1871.

Montgomery, mŏnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, de, [Fr. pron. dẹh môN'gom're',] (GABRIEL,) a French nobleman, of Scottish extraction, born about 1530. Being present at a tournament given by Henry II. on the occasion of his daughter's marriage with the King of Spain, Montgomery was summoned by the French king to break a lance with him. He complied reluctantly, and had the misfortune to inflict a mortal wound on his antagonist. He subsequently went to England, where he became a Protestant, and, after his return to France in 1562, distinguished himself as a leader of the Huguenots in the civil war of the time. Being made prisoner by Marshal Matignon at the siege of Saint-Lo, in 1574, he was condemned to death and executed, by order of Catherine de Médicis. "The queen," says Sismondi, "had no great affection for Henry II., or cause to regret him; but she wished that a man should not be considered innocent after having, even by accident, caused the death of a king."

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français;" BRANTÔME, "Capitaines illustres."

Montgon, de, dẹh môN'gôN', (CHARLES ALEXANDRE,) a French priest, born at Versailles in 1690. He entered the service of Philip V. of Spain, who sent him on a secret mission to the court of Paris. He published "Diplomatic Memoirs," (5 vols., 1742.) Died in 1770.

Monthenault or Montenault d'Égly, môN'tẹh'nō' dà'gle', (CHARLES PHILIPPE,) a French writer, born in Paris in 1696. His chief work is a "History of the French Kings of the Two Sicilies," (4 vols., 1741.) Died in 1749.

Monthion, de, dẹh môN'te'ôN', (FRANÇOIS GÉDÉON BAILLY,) COMTE, a French general, born in the Isle of Bourbon in 1776; died in 1850.

Montholon, de, dẹh môN'to'lôN', (CHARLES TRISTAN,) MARQUIS, a French general, born in Paris in 1782. He entered the army in 1798, and accompanied Napoleon in the subsequent campaigns in Italy, Austria, and Prussia. He was sent in 1811 on an important embassy to the archduke Ferdinand at Würzburg, and in 1814 was made general of brigade. He shared the emperor's exile at Saint Helena, and served him with unwearied fidelity till his death, being appointed by him executor of his will and keeper of part of his manuscripts. After his return to France, Montholon published, in conjunction with General Gourgaud, "Memoirs towards the History of France under Napoleon, dictated by Himself at Saint Helena," (1823.) He also wrote an "Account of the Captivity of Napoleon at Saint Helena," (1847.) Died in 1853.

Monti, mon'tee, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian poet, born at Bologna in 1688; died in 1766.

Monti, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian botanist, born at Bologna in 1682. He published several botanical works. Died at Bologna in 1760.

Monti, (LUIGI,) an Italian author, born at Palermo, Sicily, in 1830. He was exiled in 1849 as a revolutionist, and afterwards spent much of his time in Boston. He was United States consul at Palermo 1861–73, and wrote "The Adventures of a Consul Abroad," (1878;) also wrote "Leone," a novel, and translated several Italian works.

Monti, (RAFAELLE,) an Italian sculptor, born at Milan in 1818. Among his master-pieces may be named the "Veiled Vestal," the "Boy catching a Grasshopper," and the "Circassian Slave." He was an active supporter of the popular cause in 1847–48, after which he lived as an exile in London. Died October 16, 1881.

Monti, (VINCENZO,) a celebrated Italian poet, born near Ferrara in 1753. He studied in the university of that city, and began at an early age to write Latin and Italian poems. These compositions obtained for him the notice and patronage of Cardinal Borghese, who took Monti with him to Rome in 1778. He published in 1785 his tragedy of "Aristodemo," which was received with great favour. His poem entitled "Bassvilliana," (1793,) suggested by the murder of Hugo de Bassville, envoy of the French republic at Rome, had also great popularity, and passed through eighteen editions in six months. Upon the French invasion in 1796, Monti repaired to Milan, where, accommodating himself to the new order of things, he wrote in favour of the Revolution. Some of his writings, which originally contained bitter invectives against Napoleon, were now altered so as to transfer the abuse to the allied sovereigns. On the Russian invasion in 1799 he took refuge for a time in France, and, soon after his return, published his tragedy of "Caio Gracco," "La Mascheroniana," a poem on the death of his friend Mascheroni, and his beautiful and popular hymn beginning "Bell' Italia," etc. Monti became in 1803 professor of eloquence at Pavía, and on the coronation of Napoleon, in 1805, was appointed his historiographer. He filled this office rather as court poet than historian, and lavished a profusion of eulogistic verses on the emperor and his family. He was created by him a chevalier of the legion of honour and of the iron crown, and was chosen a member of the Institute of the kingdom of Italy. Died in 1828.

Montiano y Luyando, de, dà mon-te-à'no e loo-yân'do, (AUGUSTIN,) a Spanish dramatist, born in 1697; died in 1759.

Montjosieu, de, dẹh mŏN'zho'ze-uh', (LOUIS,) a French scholar and writer, born in Rouergue. He visited Rome in 1583. Among his works is "The Frenchman a Guest at Rome," ("Gallus Romæ Hospes," 1585.)

Montlosier, de, dẹh mŏN'lo'ze-ā', (FRANÇOIS DOMINIQUE Reynaud—rā'nō',) COMTE, a French journalist, born at Clermont-Ferrand in 1755. He was a deputy to the States-General in 1789, and was a prominent advocate of the aristocratic party. He repaired to London, where he edited an anti-revolutionary journal called the "Courrier de Londres." On his return to France, during the consulate, he modified or abandoned his royalist views. He was also for a time one of the editors of the "Constitutionnel." Having attached himself to the new dynasty on the revolution of July, he was made a peer in 1832. He wrote a work "On the French Monarchy from its Establishment to the Present Time." Died in 1838.

Montluc, de, dẹh mŏN'lük', (BLAISE de Lasseran-Massenoome—dẹh lȧs'rŏN' mȧ'sŏN'kom',) SEIGNEUR, a French marshal, born in Gascony in 1501. He fought against the Imperialists commanded by the emperor Charles V., and assisted at the sieges of La Rochelle and Calais. In 1573 he was made a marshal by Henry III. He died in 1577, leaving "Memoirs of his Military Life," (1592,) which were praised by Henry IV. and often reprinted.

Montluc, de, (JEAN,) a bishop, the brother of the preceding, was born about 1508, and was distinguished by the favour of Francis I. and Henry II., who employed him in various embassies. He became Bishop of Valence in 1553. He is said to have been secretly attached to the Reformed religion; but he retained the favour of Catherine de Médicis. Died in 1579.

Montluc, de, (JEAN,) Seigneur de Balagni, and marshal of France, a natural son of the preceding, was born about 1545. After he had fought for the League against Henry IV., he entered the service of the latter, who made him a marshal of France in 1594. Died in 1603.

Montluca, mŏN'lü'kȧ', (JEAN ÉTIENNE,) a French mathematician, born at Lyons in 1725. He became a lawyer of Paris, and a noted linguist, was the friend of Lalande and D'Alembert, and filled important civil offices. He wrote a very important "History of Mathematics," (1758 et seq.,) and died in December, 1799.

Montmaur, de, dẹh mŏN'mōr', (PIERRE,) a pedantic and witty Frenchman, born in Limousin or Le Quercy about 1564. He was professor of Greek in the Collége de France, and was notorious as a parasite. Died in 1648.

Montmorency. See LUXEMBOURG.

Montmorency or Montmorenci, mŏnt-mo-rĕn'se, [Fr. pron. mŏN'mo'rŏN'se',] the name of a noble French family, whose celebrity dates as far back as the eleventh century, and which has produced many famous princes, peers, and generals. Among them were six constables and eleven marshals of France.

Montmorency, de, dẹh mŏN'mo'rŏN'se', (ANNE,) DUC, Constable of France, born at Chantilly in 1493, was the first of his family that received the title of duke. He was made a marshal in 1522, and was taken prisoner at Pavía in 1525. In 1536, by skilful manœuvres, he defended Provence, which was invaded by Charles V. in person. He was appointed constable in 1538, and was chief minister of Francis I. from that date until 1541, when he fell into disgrace. Henry II. restored him to favour and power in 1547. Montmorency was defeated and made prisoner at the battle of Saint-Quentin, in 1557. The death of Henry II., in 1559, was fatal to his ambitious prospects, and opened the way for the accession to power of his rival the Duc de Guise. He fought for the Catholic party in the civil war, and in 1562 commanded at Dreux, where he gained the victory, but was made prisoner. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Saint-Denis, in 1567. He has been censured for austerity and excessive rigour, but had several great qualities.

Montmorency, de, (CHARLES,) a French general, who became a marshal of France in 1343. He fought against the English at Crécy in 1346. Died in 1381.

Montmorency, de, (CHARLOTTE MARGUERITE,) a French lady, born in 1594, was the sister of Duke Henri II. de Montmorency. She was married to Henri, Prince de Condé, about 1609. Her beauty made such an impression on the king, Henry IV., that her husband was alarmed, and conducted her to a foreign country. She was the mother of the great Condé, of the Prince of Conti, and of the Duchess of Longueville. Died in 1650.

See BAZIN, "Histoire de Louis XIII;" L'ESTOILE, "Mémoires," etc.

Montmorency, de, (HENRY I.,) DUC, the second son of Anne, noticed above, was styled COMTE DE DAMVILLE in his youth. He was a cousin of Admiral Coligni. At the battle of Dreux, in 1562, he took the Prince of Condé prisoner, and in 1566 obtained a marshal's bâton. He rendered important services to Henry IV., who appointed him Constable of France in 1593. Died in 1614. It is stated that a mutual passion was felt by him and Mary Queen of Scots, whom he followed to Scotland in 1561.

Montmorency, de, (HENRI II.,) DUC, a son of the preceding, was born at Chantilly in 1595. His valour, generosity, and name rendered him a great favourite with the court, the army, and the people. He commanded for Louis XIII. in the civil war against the Huguenots which began about 1620, and defeated the Duc de Rohan in 1628. For his victory over the Imperialists at Veillane, in 1629, he was made a marshal. Seduced by Gaston, a brother of Louis XIII. and heir-presumptive to the throne, and incited by enmity to Richelieu, he took arms against the government, and encountered the royal army at Castelnaudary in 1632. With too impetuous valour, he exposed himself at the head of his army, was wounded, and made prisoner. He was tried for treason, and beheaded in October, 1632. He left no issue, and the first ducal branch of the Montmorencies then became extinct. His sister was the mother of the great Prince de Condé and of the Duchesse de Longueville.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

Montmorency, de, (MATHIEU I.,) was appointed Constable of France about 1130, and was the most powerful French seigneur of his time. He married first Aline, daughter of Henry I. of England, and secondly Alix or Adelaide, the widow of Louis le Gros and mother of Louis VII. of France. He died in 1160, leaving several children by his first wife.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

Montmorency, de, (MATHIEU II.,) surnamed LE GRAND, a grandson of the preceding, was born about 1174. He contributed greatly to the victory of the French at Bouvines, in 1214. In 1218 he obtained the office of constable, which his talents and merits raised to be the highest office of the kingdom. The Constable of France was thenceforth ex officio commander-in-chief of the army. He had great influence in the reign of Louis VIII. and in that of his successor. He was nearly related to two emperors and six kings. His grand daughter married Louis de Bourbon, a great-great grandfather of Henry IV. Died in 1230.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

vāl′,) Duc, a French statesman, born in Paris in 1766, was a friend of La Fayette, in company with whom he served in the war of American Independence. He was a deputy to the States-General in 1789, and was an advocate of liberal reform. On the restoration he became a zealous royalist, and was made a peer by Louis XVIII. He was appointed minister of foreign affairs in 1821, president of the cabinet, and governor to the Duke of Bordeaux in 1823. He was also a member of the French Academy. Died in 1826.

Montrose, mont-rōz′, (James Grahame,) Marquis of, a celebrated Scottish general, born at Edinburgh in 1612. Having finished his studies in France, after his return to Scotland he served for a time in the Presbyterian army; but he subsequently went over to the royalists. He was appointed by Charles I., in 1644, Marquis of Montrose, and commander-in-chief of the Scottish forces. He signally defeated the Covenanters at Tippermuir in 1644, also at Inverlochy and at Kilsyth in 1645; but his army was surprised and totally defeated by General Leslie at Philiphaugh in September, 1645. Montrose soon after went to Germany, where he was received with great distinction by the Austrian emperor and made a marshal of the empire. Having collected a small but ill-organized force, he returned to Scotland in 1650, but was soon after defeated and taken prisoner. He was executed, without a trial, at Edinburgh, in May, 1650.

Moore, mōr, (JOHN,) a Scottish physician and distinguished writer, born at Stirling about 1730. He studied under Hamilton and Cullen at Glasgow, and afterwards spent several years on the continent. He published, after his return, "A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany," (1778,) which was followed in 1781 by a similar work on Italy. They are written in a lively and attractive style, and had great popularity at the time. His principal work is his novel of "Zeluco," (4 vols., 1789,) which was received with great favour and still enjoys a high reputation. Died in 1802.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Moore, (JOHN,) an English prelate, born at Gloucester in 1733. He became Bishop of Bangor in 1776, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1783. Died in 1805.

Moore, (Sir JOHN,) a celebrated British general, born at Glasgow in 1761, was the eldest son of Dr. John Moore, noticed above. He entered the army at the age of fifteen, and was sent in 1794 to Corsica, where he acted in conjunction with Paoli, and was conspicuous for his courage in the attack on Fort Morello and at the siege of Calvi. As general of brigade, he served under Sir Ralph Abercrombie in the West Indies in 1796, and in 1798 assisted in quelling the Irish rebellion. He accompanied General Abercrombie to Egypt in 1801, and was severely wounded at the battle of Alexandria. He was made a knight of the Bath on his return to England, and, after various services in Sicily and Sweden, was created lieutenant-general, and sent in 1808 to Spain to unite with the forces in the north against the French. On the news of the defeat of the Spanish troops along the northern frontier, and of the numerous French armies approaching, he made a rapid retreat to Coruña which, being performed in the depth of winter, was attended with great suffering. On the 16th of January, 1809, an engagement took place at Corunna, in which the English claimed the victory but lost their brave commander. His death has been commemorated by the poet Wolfe in a beautiful and popular ode, which Byron pronounced the most perfect in the English language.

Moore, (JOHN BASSETT,) a political author, born at Smyrna, Delaware, in 1860. He studied law, in 1885 became third assistant secretary of state, in 1891 professor of international law at Columbia College, in 1898 assistant secretary of state, and in the same year secretary and counsel to the Peace Commission at Paris. He is the author of "History of International Arbitrations" and other works.

Moore, (Sir JONAS,) an English mathematician, born in Lancashire in 1617, was appointed tutor to Prince James, son of Charles I., and subsequently became inspector-general of artillery. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and the author of several scientific works. He was instrumental in founding a mathematical school for sailors at Christ's Hospital, and in the construction of an observatory at Flamstead House. Died in 1679.

Moore, (MAURICE,) an American jurist and patriot of the Revolution, born in Brunswick county, North Carolina; died in 1777. His son ALFRED served with distinction in the Revolutionary war, and became associate justice of the United States supreme court in 1799. Died in 1810.

Moore, mōr, (THOMAS,) a celebrated Irish poet, born in Dublin in 1779. He entered Trinity College at an early age, but, being a Catholic, he was unable to obtain any of the university honours or offices. He afterwards studied law at the Middle Temple, London. He published in 1801 his translation of the "Odes of Anacreon," which was very successful, and was followed by "The Poetical Works of the Late Thomas Little," (1802.) In 1804 he visited the United States of America, on the society and institutions of which he made many satirical comments in his "Odes and Epistles," (1806.) His other principal works are "Lalla Rookh," (1817,) an Oriental poem, "The Twopenny Post-Bag, by Thomas Brown, Jun.," (1813,) a witty satire directed against the Tories, which had great popularity, "The Fudge Family in Paris," (1818,) "Loves of the Angels," (1823,) and "Irish Melodies," (1834.) In 1830 he published a "Life of Lord Byron," his most important prose work, which, although written entirely from the stand-point of friendship, has been highly commended by the critics. He also wrote a "Life of Sheridan," (1825,) "The Epicurean," (1827,) a prose romance, and a "History of Ireland," (1835.) Of his poems, his "Lalla Rookh" and "Irish Melodies" enjoy the highest reputation. The former, though deficient in the higher qualities of poetry, is characterized by exquisite melody of versification and splendid imagery, and in its moral tone affords a striking contrast to the frivolity and licentiousness of his earlier productions. It obtained extraordinary popularity, and was translated into many languages, including Persian. Died February 26, 1852.

Moore, (THOMAS,) an English botanist, born at Stoke-next-Guildford, May 29, 1821. He published "Hand-Book of British Ferns," (1848,) "Elements of Botany," (1865,) "Epitome of Gardening," (1881,) and other works, chiefly on ferns and orchids. Died January 1, 1887.

He is said to have been the first of his countrymen who wrote on that science; and Europe is indebted to him for its introduction and its name.

Moosa-Ibn-Noseyr, moo'sȧ ĭb'n no-sār', (or no-sĭr',) (Aboo-Abd-er-Rahman, ȧ'bōō ȧb'dẹr rȧh'mȧn,) a celebrated Arab conqueror, was born at Mecca about 660 A.D. He was appointed in 703 Viceroy of Africa, and, having subjected the northern part of that country, from Tripoli to Morocco, he turned his arms against Spain. In conjunction with his lieutenant Târik, he took Seville, Merida, Saragossa, and other cities of Southern and Central Spain, to which he subsequently added the most important towns of Catalonia. Among other articles of great value of which he had possessed himself was the emerald table called the table of Solomon, taken at Medina-Celi. Moosa, having been summoned to Damascus by the caliph, presented to him this table, and, on his expressing his surprise that it should have three legs of emerald and one of gold, Moosa replied that he had found it in this condition. Tarik, however, immediately exposed the falsehood of his rival by producing the fourth leg of the table. For this offence he was condemned to a heavy fine by Solyman, who afterwards caused his son Abd-el-azeez to be assassinated. Moosa died in obscurity in 718.

Moratin, de, dä mo-rä-teen', (LEANDRO FERNANDEZ,) an eminent dramatist, sometimes called "the Spanish Molière," was born at Madrid in 1760. He was appointed in 1787, through the influence of Jovellanos, secretary to the Spanish embassy in Paris, and published, soon after his return, his comedy of "The Old Man and the Young Girl," ("El Viejo y la Niña,") which was very successful. Among the most popular of his other works are "The Impostor," ("El Baron,") "Yes of the Maidens," ("Si de las Niñas,") "The Young Hypocrite," ("La Mogigata,") and "The New Comedy," ("La Comedia nueva.") His "Origines del Teatro Español," (1838,) a critical treatise, is also highly esteemed. Moratin became first librarian to Joseph Bonaparte in 1811, and during the subsequent troubles in Spain took refuge in France, where he died in 1828.

Mordaunt, mor'dant, (CHARLES,) Earl of Peterborough, a famous English general, of chivalrous and eccentric character, born in 1658, was the son and heir of John, Lord Mordaunt. He first appears prominently in history as a staunch Whig and opponent of James II. In 1689 he was created Earl of Monmouth and placed at the head of the treasury, but the next year he retired from that office, which was ill suited to his volatile and generous character. He afterwards inherited the title of his uncle, the Earl of Peterborough. During the war of the Spanish succession he commanded an English army of 5000 men which arrived in Spain in 1705 and performed a series of brilliant exploits, among which was the capture of Barcelona and Valencia, (1706.) Thwarted in his plans by the archduke Charles of Austria, he obtained leave to retire from the army, and was recalled to England in 1707. Through hostility to Marlborough, he supported the Tories in the political contests which ensued, and after the accession of George I. was consequently excluded from office. He died in 1735. His second wife was Anastasia Robinson, a celebrated singer and actress. In the opinion of Macaulay, he was "the most extraordinary character of that age, the King of Sweden not excepted. His fertility and activity of mind were almost beyond belief. He loved to dictate six or seven letters at once. He was a kind friend, a generous enemy, and a thorough gentleman. But his splendid talents and virtues were rendered almost useless to his country by his levity, his restlessness, his irritability, his morbid craving for novelty and excitement." ("Essays.")

More, (ANTONIO.) See MOOR.

More, (HANNAH,) an English writer, whose moral and religious works enjoyed great popularity in her time, was born at Stapleton, near Bristol, in 1745. She published in 1773 a pastoral drama, entitled "The Search after Happiness," and in 1774 "The Inflexible Captive," a tragedy, which introduced her to the notice of Garrick, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent men of that period, by whom she was greatly esteemed for the excellence of her character. She was the author of several other dramas, which were very favourably received; but, owing to her convictions of the immoral tendency of the stage, she abandoned dramatic writing, and, while her popularity was still at its height, devoted herself to compositions of a moral and religious character. Among the principal of these we may name "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," (1788,) "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education," (1799,) "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess," (1805,) written for Charlotte, Princess of Wales, "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife," (1809,) and several contributions to the "Cheap Repository Tracts," one of which is entitled "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." Died in 1833.

More, [Lat. MO'RUS,] (HENRY,) an English divine and philosophical writer, born in Lincolnshire in 1614. He studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen a Fellow. He refused several high preferments in the church, and passed his life in retirement, devoted chiefly to the study of philosophy. He was the author of "Psychozoia, or the Life of the Soul," (1640,) "Enchiridium Metaphysicum," "Conjectura Cabalistica," "The Mystery of Godliness," "Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul," and other works, in which he favours the Platonic system. He was a man of fine genius, profound learning, and rare excellence of character. He was one of the first Fellows of the Royal Society, and was a friend and correspondent of Descartes. Died in 1687.

More, (JAMES.) See MOORE.

More, [Lat. MO'RUS; It. and Sp. MO'RO,] (Sir THOMAS,) an eminent English wit, philosopher, and statesman, born in London in 1480, was a son of Sir John More, a judge of the court of king's bench. He received the first rudiments of his education at Saint Anthony's School, London, where he learned Latin. At the age of fifteen he became a page in the house of Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury and prime minister, who was much pleased with the wit of young More and predicted that he would prove "a marvellous man." In 1497 he entered the University of Oxford, where he studied Greek as a pupil of Grocyn and formed an intimate and lasting friendship with Erasmus. He gained distinction at Oxford as a writer of English and of Latin verses. Having left college, he studied law at Lincoln's Inn. "He manifested," says Mackintosh, "a predilection for monastic life, and is said to have practised some of those austerities and self-inflictions which prevail among the gloomier and more stern orders." He resolved, indeed, at one time to turn monk, and actually became a lay brother of the Carthusian convent (the Charter-House) in London, where he is said to have passed several years, devoting himself at the same time to the study of the classics, the French language, and music. He afterwards entertained thoughts of becoming a priest; but on further reflection, and influenced perhaps by the general corruption of the priestly orders, he abandoned his design. In the words of Erasmus, "Maluit maritus esse castus quam sacerdos impurus," ("he preferred to be a chaste husband rather than an impure priest.") About 1502 he married Jane Colt, the eldest daughter of a gentleman of Essex. He had a slight preference for her younger sister, but was so good-natured that he sacrificed his inclination, that he might not wound the feelings of the eldest. This union proved very happy, but his wife died a few years after her marriage, leaving him a son and three daughters, of whom Margaret, the eldest, inherited the features, goodness, and genius of her father. His graceful and varied learning was only surpassed by his sprightly, inexhaustible wit. "With him," says Erasmus, "you might imagine yourself in the Academy of Plato." He attained great eminence at the bar, and about 1502 became an under-sheriff of London,—i.e. a judge of the sheriff's court. He appears to have been the first Englishman that cultivated oratory with any great success. "He is," says Mackintosh, "the first person in our history distinguished by the faculty of public speaking, and remarkable for the successful employment of it in Parliament against a lavish grant of money to the crown." He was elected to Parliament about 1504, and, by persuading the Commons not to grant a supply to Henry VII. on the occasion of the marriage of his daughter, deeply offended that king. More had in consequence resolved to leave the country; but the death of Henry relieved him from all apprehensions.

Having lost his first wife, he married a widow named Alice Middleton. In 1513 he wrote a "History of Richard III.," which, says Hallam, "appears to me the first example of good English language, pure and perspicuous, well chosen, without vulgarisms or pedantry." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") He was sent on a mission to Flanders in 1514, and about that date became a favourite of Henry VIII., who not only consulted him in affairs of state, but preferred him as the companion of his amusements and convivial hours. In 1516 he produced his famous Platonic fiction of "Utopia," (in Latin,) describing an imaginary commonwealth in the island of Utopia, the citizens of which had all things in common. He resigned the office of under-sheriff in 1519, was appointed treasurer of the exchequer in 1521, and chosen Speaker of the House of Commons in 1523. He gave proof of his firmness and independence by his answer to Cardinal Wolsey, who demanded a very great subsidy for the king. About 1523 More began to write tracts against Luther.

In October, 1529, he was appointed lord chancellor in place of Cardinal Wolsey. Although the Protestants were persecuted while he held that office, it would appear that he was not responsible for the persecution. "It is a sufficient proof of his clemency," says Erasmus, "that while he was chancellor no man was put to death for these pestilent dogmas."*

* This statement is contradicted by Froude, who says, "Soon after the seals changed hands, the Smithfield fires recommenced; and, the chancellor acting in concert with them, the bishops resolved to obliterate, in these edifying spectacles, the recollection of their general infirmities." He afterwards cites the case of Bainham, who was burned in April, 1532, a short time before More resigned the office of chancellor. The account of Bainham's execution appears to rest upon the single testimony of Foxe, who, though generally trustworthy, might possibly be mistaken, especially when he was obliged to depend wholly on the statements of others. He was but a boy when Bainham's death took place. More, whose word is not to be lightly set aside, expressly denies in his "Apology" (published the next year) that he was guilty of any cruel treatment of the heretics. If the denial was false, there were doubtless many then living who could prove it to be so. It appears, however, never to have been contradicted. How far he was responsible for the acts of the bishops it is difficult to say.

Suitors were astonished at the contrast between the affable More and the haughty Cardinal Wolsey. Sir Thomas resigned the great seal in May, 1532, because his conscience refused to sanction the divorce of Queen Catherine and the second marriage of the king. "Henry had tried every possible means to obtain at least the appearance of his spontaneous approbation." (Mackintosh.) In 1533 he wrote a work called "The Apology of Sir Thomas More."

Having declined to take the oath by which he was required to acknowledge the validity of the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, he was committed to the Tower in April, 1534. After he had been in prison more than a year, he was charged with denying the king's supremacy as the head of the Church; and, his answers not having been found satisfactory, he was pronounced guilty of treason, and was beheaded on the 6th of July, 1535. "The scaffold had been awkwardly erected, and shook as he placed his foot upon the ladder. 'See me safe up,' he said to Kingston; 'for my coming down I can shift for myself.' . . . The executioner offered to tie his eyes. 'I will cover them myself,' he said; and, binding them in a cloth which he had brought with him, he knelt, and laid his head upon the block. The fatal stroke was about to fall, when he signed for a moment's delay, while he moved aside his beard. 'Pity that should be cut,' he murmured: 'that has not committed treason.' With which strange words,—the strangest, perhaps, ever uttered at such a time,—the lips most famous through Europe for eloquence and wisdom closed forever." (Froude's "History of England," chap. ix.) Alluding to his behaviour on the scaffold, Addison remarks, "The innocent mirth which had been so conspicuous in his life did not forsake him at the last. His death was of a piece with his life; there was nothing in it new, forced, or affected. He did not look upon the severing his head from his body as a circumstance which ought to produce any change in the disposition of his mind; and, as he died in a fixed and settled hope of immortality, he thought any unusual degree of sorrow and concern improper." ("Spectator," No. 349.) According to the account of his great-grandson, More "was of a middle stature, well proportioned, of a pale complexion, his hair of chestnut colour, his eyes gray, his countenance mild and cheerful."

Moreau, (François Joseph,) a French physician, born at Auxonne in 1789, practised in Paris. He published a "Traité des Accouchements," (2 vols., 1838-41.) Died in 1862.

Moreau, (Gustave,) a French painter, born at Paris in 1836. His "Œdipus and the Sphinx" (1864) gave rise to a violent controversy between the admirers and opponents of his ideal style. He was made professor at the École des Beaux Arts in 1892. Died in 1898.

Moreau, (Hégésippe,) a French poet, born in Paris in 1810, was the author of songs, elegies, and satires, of considerable merit, and a prose work entitled "The Mistletoe of the Oak," ("Le Gui de Chêne.") He died, in great poverty, in 1838.

Moreau, (Jacob Nicolas,) a French writer, born at Saint-Florentin in 1717, was appointed historiographer of France under Louis XVI. He wrote a "Discourse on the History of France," "Duties of a Prince," and other works. Died in 1803.

Moreau, (Jean Baptiste,) a French musician and composer, born at Angers in 1656, was patronized at the court of Louis XIV., and was employed by Racine to compose the choruses for his "Athalie" and "Esther." Died in 1733.

Moreau, (Jean Michel,) a French engraver and designer, born in Paris in 1741, became draughtsman of the royal cabinet, and a member of the Academy of Painting. He executed one hundred and sixty plates for the "History of France," and upwards of one hundred for editions of Voltaire and Molière. Died in 1814.

Moreau, (Jean Victor,) one of the most eminent generals of France, was born at Morlaix, in Brittany, August 11, 1763. He studied law, and was provost of law at Rennes just before the Revolution. In 1792 he enlisted in the republican army, and, as chef de bataillon, served under Dumouriez. He became a general of brigade in 1793, and a general of division in 1794. In the latter year he commanded with éclat the right wing of Pichegru's army, which conquered Holland. In the spring of 1796 he succeeded Pichegru as commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, and opened the campaign which was the foundation of his military fame. His passage of the Rhine at Strasbourg was greatly applauded. He drove the Austrians back to the Danube, and then, finding his army outnumbered, after several indecisive actions he performed the famous and masterly retreat through the Black Forest, which was one of his chief exploits. He was suspended from the command in 1797 by the Directory, who probably suspected him of complicity in the defection of his friend Pichegru.

The reverses of the French having rendered his services necessary, he was appointed general-in-chief of the army of Italy in the spring of 1799. At the battle of Novi he had three horses killed under him, and made a skilful retreat, soon after which he was transferred to the command of the army of the Rhine. In the political crisis of 18th Brumaire, (November 9, 1799,) Moreau was in Paris, and consented to support Bonaparte in subverting the power of the Directory. Some suppose that if he had been less modest, or more ambitious, he might have acted the principal rôle in that great drama. The First Consul intrusted to Moreau the command of the army of Germany, and dictated to him a plan of the campaign, which the latter refused to adopt. "Moreau would not submit," says Alison, "to the indignity of acting as second in command to his former rival, and said, 'I have no notion of seeing a little Louis XIV. at the head of my army.'" ("History of Europe.")

After an angry discussion, he persisted in his own plan, and, while Bonaparte marched to the conquest of Italy, he invaded the valley of the Danube in May, 1800, with about 100,000 men. Between the 1st and 10th of May he defeated the Austrians under Kray at Engen and Biberach. In the next month he gained a decisive victory at Hochstadt, near Blenheim. After an armistice of a few months, the two armies met on December 3, 1800, at Hohenlinden, where Moreau won a very important victory, which induced the Austrians to sue for peace. The war being thus ended, he went to Paris, and became the chief of a party composed of royalists and republicans united by their enmity to Napoleon.

In 1804 he was arrested as an accomplice in Pichegru's conspiracy, and, although they failed to prove that he had any active part in it, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, which was commuted to exile in the United States. He resided with his wife at Morrisville, Pennsylvania, and in the city of New York, until overtures from the Czar of Russia induced him to return to Europe in July, 1813. He was caressed by the allied sovereigns and received with triumphal demonstrations by the people of Germany. The Czar said to Moreau, (who, it appears, was still a republican,) "I know your opinions; I will do nothing which can thwart them, and will leave France perfectly free." With these views, he co-operated with the allies against the French, and was mortally wounded at Dresden, August 27, 1813. He announced the fact by letter to his wife in these terms: "At the battle of Dresden, three days ago, I had both legs carried off by a cannon-ball. That rascal Bonaparte is always fortunate. Excuse my scrawl," etc.

Mornay, de, deh mor'nā', (PHILIPPE,) Seigneur du Plessis-Marly, often called DU PLESSIS-MORNAY, a noble French Protestant, eminent for virtue and talents, was born at Buhy, in Vexin, in 1549. He studied law, theology, and other sciences in Paris, Germany, and Italy. In 1572 he narrowly escaped from the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, and in 1575 took arms for the Huguenots, of whom he became one of the chiefs. He married in 1576. About this time he entered the service of Henry of Navarre, who employed him in important negotiations and reposed in him entire confidence. He took part in the battle of Ivry in 1590, and then became a member of Henry IV.'s council. Mornay retained the favour of Henry after the latter had abjured his religion. In 1598 he published a "Treatise on the Institution of the Eucharist," which provoked the Catholics to challenge him to a dispute. At a public conference before the king, in 1600, he was foiled by Duperron. It appears that one of his own party had as unwisely as dishonourably furnished him with forged quotations from the Fathers, which his antagonist easily exposed. He was for many years the virtual chief or oracle of the French Reformed Church, and was styled "the Pope of the Huguenots." He left many able religious works. Died in 1623.
